Reporter Tells Of Flight In B52 Nuclear Bomber

Editor's Note: Russell Nielsen is the first newsmen to accompany a crew on a flight in a B52 nuclear bomber, the Strategic Air Command's main weapon of retaliation in case of attack.

By RUSSELL NIELSEN
SPOKANE (UPI) — It takes a good plane and a good crew to deliver a nuclear bomb to a target halfway around the world — and Maj. Rodney Barto has both. Should enemy planes or missiles wing toward this country, Barto's crew would have its sleek, eight-jet bomber in the air within 15 minutes to retaliate. This requires practice — and that was the purpose of this flight. Every phase of a flight to the enemy's homeland must be practiced until the crewmen can perform their various duties mechanically. Today's mission involved aerial refueling, navigation and bombing. Lt. Col. George Cameron, commander of the 328th Bomb Squadron at Fairchild Air Force Base here, was at the controls as the B52 shrieked down the runway and then began a fast climb to rendezvous with a KC135 tanker at 27,000 feet. Cameron slowly slipped the bomber through the downburst of the tanker's engines until it was just below and behind the B52. The extended refueling boom made its connection just behind the cockpit, and Cameron worked to keep the plane level. The tanker's tail hovered just above the bomber's cockpit. Barto, the aircraft commander, and a pilot of various types of bombers since World War II, took the next refuel run. Once, after the connection was made, the B52 began to swing sharply from side to side because of the tanker's downburst. Barto chuckled into the intercom to S.Sgt. James Hill, "Stay with me, gunner." The gunner is positioned in the remote tail turret. His only connection with the crew is by intercom — and he has a rough ride during refuel operations. For two hours, Cameron and Barto practiced these high-speed hookups which require great flying skill, but vastly increase the bomber's range. Then we headed east on a navigational exercise to Minot, N.D. The bomber loafed along at about 450 miles per hour, and at 39,000 feet the ride was smoother than if we had been in the finest car on the finest highway. At Minot, we climbed to 41,000 and headed southwest to Salt Lake City. The brown of the Montana plains gave way to the white-topped green of the Wyoming mountains, and soon the Great Salt Lake appeared as a huge steel-blue blob. Here we veered northwest for a bombing run on Boise, Idaho. Capt. William Jent, the navigator, and Capt. James Weiss, the radarman, huddled over their table downstairs and cross-checked the information gathered by their instruments. The material was fed into a ballistics control panel. Weiss took command of the plane during the final moments, took it in on radar, and made a simulated bomb drop — which, if real, would have sent the unsuspecting city rising in a column of dust. Several more bomb runs and then we headed home to Spokane.

His father is an employee of the ZX Ranch which is owned by the cattle company.

Plants Slated For Exhibition

Growers of new and unusual plants in Klamath and Lake counties will have a chance to exhibit them at the Oregon Centennial Exposition, world-wide in scope, to be held in Portland in June, 1959. Officials of the Centennial Commission, here yesterday for an official meeting, said local garden clubs will appoint a chairman soon who will handle arrangements for entries. The plants entered will go into a 5 1/2 acre landscaped garden, which will be one of the highlights of the exposition. All nations have been invited to submit plant material for inclusion. The foreign plants will be arranged to blend beautifully with those submitted from all parts of Oregon. After the exposition ends its 100-day run, all plant material will be removed to Washington Park in Portland, which is now the site of the Portland Zoo. It will become a permanent attraction there.
