As You Were Saying...

A Tale of Two Squirrels. While picnicking in Yosemite National Park, two of its little residents taught us a moral.

Our picnic lunch was spread on the grass, and soon we noticed two beady-eyed squirrels peeking at us. We tossed a crumb toward them. Startled, they retreated behind a tree.

One ventured out, however, and snatched it. So we tossed more crumbs and they became bolder. We noticed a difference between them. One was chubby, the other long and lean. Fatty was getting all the crumbs; sometimes he'd almost eat them out of our hands. Skinny, however, would come only so far, then panic and run back.

"Just like people," Dad said. "Those with courage enough to go after things usually get them. Those afraid to risk anything do without. Both squirrels have the same opportunity, but one is too frightened to take advantage of it."—Kay Stacy, Ogden, Utah.

Perils of the Party Line. When I was manager of a small-town telephone company, I frequently handled complaints of party-line customers. One day a woman with a reputation for long-windedness called to complain about another woman on her line who, she said, listened in on all her conversations.

After she had talked for nearly 30 minutes, assuring me several times that she never talked long on the phone, another voice was heard. It said, "I'm the other woman, and Mrs. — is a liar. I never listen on the line. She's using it all the time. Why she's talked more than half an hour now. I know, because I timed her."—W. B., Grand Rapids, Mich.

Benevolent Bureaucracy. Until recently I believed that all Government officials were so devoted to the letter of the law that they had no compassion for the individual. Now I know better.

My husband was killed in an accident when our children were 2 and 4, and since then we've received monthly benefits under the survivors' provisions of Social Security. Through a mistake of my own, I recently accepted an overpayment.

Then, after an investigation of my financial status, I received this formal letter from the Social Security Administration:

"... with reference to the incorrect payment in the amount of $67.33 which you received... it has been determined that it will not be necessary for you to refund it..."—Mrs. M. B., Marietta, O.
