ers Assn. of Philadelphia, June 26. The Bulletin put its drivers back on the payroll. Deliveries were not resumed, however, because the Inquirer drivers refused to cross the Guild picket lines, and the publishers association — also representing the Inquirer — said drivers were obligated to go back to work at the same time at both newspapers. The Bulletin has 10 Guild unit.

The final terms were worked out in an unannounced all-night session of top management and Guild officials at which the Teamsters Union also was represented.

The Guild strike involved 710 employees of the Inquirer news and clerical departments. The Guild first sought an increase from $137 to $148 for writing reporters' top minimums after five years employment, a general wage increase of $4 to $7, an increase in pension contributions, and a 35-hour week instead of 37½, all in a one-year contract.

The Inquirer's initial offer was reported to be an immediate $2 to $5 general wage boost, and an increase from 1.9 to 4 per cent of the total basic weekly payroll to be contributed into the pension fund in the second year of a two-year agreement, with no increases in the second year.

The contract as accepted calls for wage increases of $3 to $5 for the first year with the larger amount going to those making $100 or more a week. In the second year each employee will get $2 more.

That means the minimum for rewrite men and writing reporters, with at least four years experience in that category, will be $144. The leg men—reporters who dig up news and mostly telephone it to their control desks—received somewhat less than those who do the writing. Desk men earn $14 more a week.

In the second year, the inquires will make a further contribution to the pension fund of 1.1 per cent, making a total contribution of 3 per cent of the total payroll. The Guild estimated that the addition would increase pension benefits to about $75 a month.

The pay and pension provisions were the same as those previously rejected, but the approved agreement embodied what the Guild called job protection for the membership. The Guild had defined job security as a key issue.
