... "NOW BEFORE we begin the tour, folks, let me tell you a little bit about why he came here in the first place.

"He was taking a boat trip down the river and he spotted that clump of bamboo. He'd wanted to use bamboo in some of his experiments. So later he came back and bought 14 acres.

"Over there's a dynamite tree. You oughta hear those seed pods pop. Watch for the orchids along the walk. This tree came from India. He collected them from all over the world. He was interested in what could be done with some of them."

The tourist in the thin sweater shivered a little in the coolness by the river. The man with the camera eyed the old house for unusual angles.

"Here's the office and the swimming pool. He never had much time for swimming, but he sure spent a lot of time in this office. It's been preserved just as it was, even down to the turtleback spittoon." Some people like to glorify him because he was such a famous man, but even geniuses are human. So he liked cigars, but he chewed 'em mostly. That's the reason for all the spittoons."

The house was a dim sanctum.

The tour group peered intently at the incandescent bulbs and into the bedroom of his wife. It was almost as though they expected a gentle, white-haired woman to walk across to the spacious living room under her own portrait. It was almost as though he might materialize in the wheel chair he used in the years of his infirmity. It was creased still with the marks of his heavy body.

In the pantry shone the copper of the samovar from Czar Nicholas and on the porch wall hung the varnished and long-defunct tarpon caught by the scientist's son.

"Now, folks, step right along and we'll go over to the rubber laboratory. He slept a little on this cot when he was working on a new project. Like the time he extracted rubber from goldenrod in case America needed it in wartime. You can see back there the morning glory phonograph he built. He got pretty hard of hearing, but that didn't lick him. He used these earphones. Sometimes he stayed 24 hours over here, working on his inventions."

An old photograph dominated the wall. The guide pointed to it with his cane.

"There's the picture of him with his good friends Henry Ford and Harvey Firestone. You can tell he was a pretty good-sized fellow, but it looks like he bought his suits even bigger."

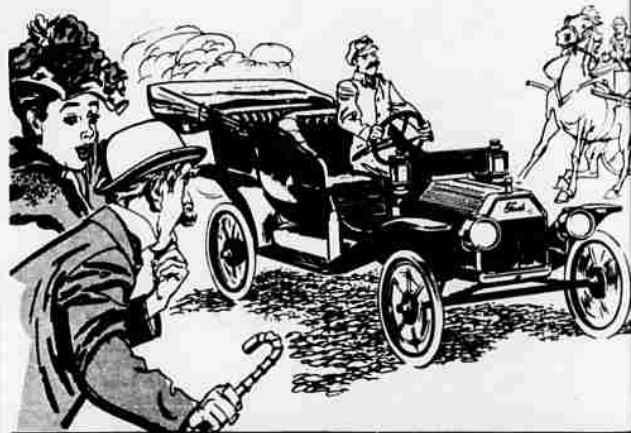

The tourists chuckled. The white suit did appear to wrinkle and fold about the old man. But one of the group spoke quietly.

"I don't know. Lots of scientists these days. When he lived, it seems like Tom Edison was a kind of giant."

"Maybe he was big enough for that suit after all."

THEY SAID IT COULDN'T

"Couldn't be done, couldn't be done." They said nobody could produce an automobile that everybody could afford. But Henry Ford built the first MODEL "T" in 1908 ... and put America on wheels.
