Five-Percent Plan Could Mean Victory Over Slump

By WARD CANNEL
NEA Staff Correspondent

RIDGEFIELD, N.J. (NEA) — While this small industrial city holds its municipal breath, "The Ridgefield Plan" is providing a unique demonstration of man's power to pull himself out of a business slump.

Like any other plan to restore prosperity, this one aims at pumping money into the economy. But unlike other schemes, this one calls for voluntary pledges:

By industry — to spend five per cent of its plant value for immediate repairs and improvement.

By homeowners — to spend five per cent of their savings or annual wages or home value for home improvement.

By renters — to spend that five per cent on durable goods.

By service people — to lower their costs by five per cent.

By the bank — to reduce interest rates on home loans to five per cent.

During one month of intensive canvassing, every businessman and resident in this north Jersey city was asked to pledge.

Today, according to Councilman Frank Gennari, building permits have tripled, "and everywhere you look you see houses getting new coats of paint, patios, flower boxes."

In the 30 days of the plan, home improvement loans jumped 50 per cent, according to Cassius Daly, vice president of the local bank. "The average loan: about $1,500."

Industry has pledged to repair and improve its property by well over $1,500,000.

Local merchants, grasping the merchandising value of a five per cent reduction, have brought in new trade from neighboring communities. And service people have used the same technique to get old and new customers "to do it now."

Even the local diner, lopping five per cent off each check, bought a new coffee urn at a five per cent saving.

As the plan came to an end, a startled Ridgefield found that its 11,000 residents and businessmen had pumped $2,225,000 into the city's four square miles.

"And that's the whole trouble," says Arthur W. Schmidt who runs a TV sales and repair shop. "We've got a success in a vacuum. Unless the rest of the U.S. learns from us, we will have failed."

The plan's originator, Samuel Rubin, agrees that unless the plan catches on the money pumped into the local economy soon will be dissipated. But Rubin, who is president of Faberge Perfumes in Ridgefield, asks:

"How can you force people to accept a voluntary plan? Besides it's improper for us to mess around with the business of other communities."

Nevertheless, Rubin can dream: If Americans spend five per cent of their savings, that puts $14,000,000 into the economy immediately. And not without return, because that money buys home improvement and makes property more valuable.

And if industry spends five per cent of its plant value on repair and improvement — there's no telling where the economy can go.

"Look at Ridgefield," he says. "We kicked this plan off at a community picnic in a driving rain. And even so, 3,000 people showed up."

"We certainly encountered skepticism, but no real opposition. That's remarkable, isn't it? For a new plan — never tried before — to get such quick reception."

The actual timetable on Rubin's plan is even more remarkable. The idea came to him while he was flat on his back, recuperating from injuries caused by a tractor that fell on him. One month later New Jersey Sen. Clifford Case was standing under an umbrella, telling Ridgefield residents that their plan was doing a wonderful job.

"And that," says Rubin, "is what we can teach our neighbors across the country. This recession is man-made and can be man-cured. And people will respond voluntarily if they know why."

New Regime In Iraq Seems To Be Independent-Minded

Editor's Note: The tough, traditionally armed Kurdish tribesmen of Northern Iraq presented the new Iraq regime with one of its biggest questions. Would they accept the change in government or would they be hostile? United Press International correspondent Dan Gilmore went to Kirkuk to find out. His dispatch follows:

By DANIEL F. GILMORE
KIRKUK, Iraq (UPI) — The new regime in Iraq appears to be winning allegiance from the tough independent-minded Kurd tribesmen who for generations successfully defied Turkish, Russian, British, French and Arabic domination.

One of the big uncertainties of the Iraqi situation was the position that the strong-willed Kurds, who control this oil-drenched northern area, would take to the Republican regime.

So far, they are publicly pledging support to the successors of King Faisal and Premier Nuri Es-Said.

But they have their own language, religion, customs and ideals. A cherished hope, supported by Britain and the United States during and after World War I, is an autonomous Kurdistan.

This would include the mountainous belt reaching to Turkey through Northern Iraq, Iran and into Russia itself.

No realist thinks such a Kurdistan will evolve in our times.

But the nascent tribalism of the Kurds is undoubtedly causing some preoccupation to the new Iraqi authorities.

The fact is the Kurds are not Arabs. They never have been and by all indications never will be. The Kurds, who number about 450,000 are as different from the Iraqi people as their cool and green mountainous country is from the flat, scorching desert land to the south.

They traditionally carry arms even when at peace. It is customary for them to lay the arms aside when entering cities, but I saw two or three toting rifles in Kirkuk.

If they ever did take up arms against the new regime, they would be no match for the modern equipment of the Iraqi army but they could cause harassment from their mountain fastness.

The new regime hastened to publicize telegrams of support from Kurdish leaders during the first days after the coup d'etat.

There appeared to be no basis for reports that Kurds, "pro-loyalist" rebels, held out against the new regime in the mountains.

The few travelers I saw from the Turkish border down as far as Kirkuk, I got the same report from travelers returning from the Iranian border.

Kirkuk was as quiet on the surface as Baghdad and all the villages we passed.

Medicos Asked To Answer Leading Question On Beds

CHICAGO (AP) — A leading question placed before the nation's doctors today is: Should married couples sleep in the same bed or in separate beds?

Dr. T. R. Pratt, retired Pismo Beach, Calif., physician, made the query in a letter to the Journal of the American Medical Assn.

A journal editor submitted the question to two unidentified medical specialists serving as consultants and printed their replies.

The first consultant started out by saying that the active health of an individual is dependent on how thoroughly his or her body cells receive physiological rest in slumber.

"But because humans are peculiarly psychological beings as well, interplay of personality injects an element of choice or preference," he added.

This preference, he went on, is something that can't be defined, categorized or legislated.

"The answer to the query then," he concluded, "lies in a mutual decision of the marriage partners as to whether single beds or a double bed provide better healthful balance of restful sleep and wakeful togetherness."

The second consultant suggested without going on record one way or another that in view of the nation's population trend the question should be rephrased to ask: "Should husbands and wives stop sleeping together?"

An AP reporter then referred the query to Dr. Nathan Kleitman, professor of physiology at the University of Chicago.

Kleitman, who has spent more than 30 years studying volunteer sleepers and the phenomena of sleep, said without hesitation:

"Physiologically, it is better for each to sleep alone in a double bed. Particularly in summer when one doesn't huddle in one spot to stay warm."
