An ambitious young home repairman was determined to become a success at any cost—particularly his customers' costs. Overworked, he died when only 43. When he reached the other world, he filled out the necessary forms and listed his age.

This caused some consternation among celestial authorities. Why should the home serviceman be called so young? Somebody checked the files and returned to the candidate.

"Well, we got that straightened out," he said with relief. "According to the working hours you charged your customers, you're at least 127."

"Fooled you this time—I didn't end up in the corner."

A rancher was driving his Eastern visitor over the arid and barren country of western Texas. The sun was blistering hot, the wind dusty dry. Suddenly a beautifully plumed bird ran across the road. The Easterner was impressed with its exotic coloring and asked what kind of a bird it was.

"Why, that's a Bird of Paradise, Son," the rancher replied proudly.

The next mile was driven in thoughtful silence. Then the visitor broke it with, "Pretty long way from home, isn't it?"

A terribly jealous woman used to submit her husband to a regular inspection every evening. The slightest hair discovered on his coat would lead to weeping, recriminations, and threats.

One night the husband returned, his suit coat spic and span. The wife searched in vain for a wisp of hair, then cried out—"This is too much! Bald women now!"
