Quips and Quotes

"Tommy," whispered the lady to her small son, playing with his tin soldiers, "your grandfather is ill. It would be nice if you'd go in and cheer him up a bit."

Tommy hesitated a moment but manfully did as his mother told him. He tiptoed into the darkened room and regarded his grandfather with concern until the old man stirred and looked at him. Then Tommy asked solicitously, "Gramps, would you like to have my soldiers guard your funeral?"

A doting dog owner enrolled her poodle in a training school for canines. When the pooch came home after the first session the owner cooed, "And what did you learn today, Lionel? Geography?" The dog shook his head. "Arithmetic?" Again Lionel shook his shaggy head. "Well, perhaps a foreign language?" The dog arched his back, lashed his tail, and answered, "Meeow!"

Just Wave as You Go By

Now that the Summer travel season is nearing its end, I feel safe in saying that 1958 was a banner year for tourists who throw trash in our yard. Not only was the quantity of debris up, but its intrinsic interest. Just the other day, for instance, I found a Paushmayer beer can in the peony bed near the road—a welcome contrast to familiar local brands and all the more broadening because research proved Paushmayer's retail outlets are 700 miles west of us as the suds fly.

In recent months I've also picked up a match packet advertising a Louisiana supermarket (we live in Connecticut, which has its own supermarkets), a weekly newspaper from a small North Dakota town (complete with a listing of folks who visited Bismarck on the week end), and an empty vitamin bottle from a Texas pharmacy. These collector's items are now on our mantle, awing neighbors and friends.

Not only is America traveling farther, it's traveling richer. One of my most hallowed pieces of trash is the fragment of a caviar canapé which I came upon last week—such a change from the usual dry cheese sandwich! It's my theory the canapé was discarded by some wealthy chap who never soiled his hands with the actual operation but had his chauffeur give it the old heave-ho. Just the same, it gives us a warm feeling to know that all you tourists, rich and poor, near and far, are constantly remembering us.—Parke Cummings
