Reforestation Groups Visit Sugar Hill

The Reforestation Committee of the California area has made a recent inspection of the Sugar Hill plantations on the Modoc National Forest. Visiting foresters with the committee included Jose Ayala and Carlos De Juan, of Spain, Bing Yen Yang, of Republic of China, and professor Dietrich Mulder, of University of California.

The Sugar Hill plantations have long been an attraction to foresters of the California area. Up to the present time, over 6,500 acres have been reforested by planting in the North Warner Mountains between Fandango Creek and North Fork of Davis Creek. This reforested area represents an investment of approximately one-quarter of a million dollars over a period from 1950 to 1958. It is the largest single area of artificial reforestation in the state of California today.

The Sugar Hill area had been devastated by a series of four large forest fires beginning in 1929. The first plantations, No. 1 and No. 2, were planted in the spring of 1930, just south of Fandango Creek, and the long job of reforestation was begun. Today these first two plantations, now 28 years old, have trees over 40 feet in height and over 16 inches in diameter. From a blackened, devastated, wasteland in the spring of 1930, the area has once again been returned to a forested area—all within the lifetime and memory of many local Modoc residents who worked at the planting of these pine trees. To uninformed visitors of the forest, the area seems strange because "the trees all grow in rows."
