The young man stood and watched the frenzy, hands in his pockets.

FABULOUS BUM

Art by James Hill

THE YOUNG MAN in the baseball cap drove the tiny sports car through the night with the ease of a professional.

He caught only a glimpse of the road sign ahead, but his reflexes were quick. He braked the car down and turned in at the Salt Creek Inn. He found a place at the back of the parking lot and killed the engine.

Pushing the cap back from his face, he stretched and yawned. He scratched the day-old stubble of a golden beard and climbed out of the car. He was very tall, a loose-jointed man with an outthrust jaw. He was wearing denim jacket and jeans, a battered pair of moccasins.

He walked slowly through the rows of parked cars, taking everything in with obvious satisfaction. The moon was new in the sky, round and yellow. It revealed a stand of willows, a bend in the creek, the old stones of a millrace, and the dark-timbered mill itself, bright with lights and an inviting doorway into the restaurant.

Going in, he glanced over the crowded dining room and then waited, his hands jammed into the slash pockets of his jacket.

It was a girl who came toward him finally, a straight-standing girl in a dark suit, carrying an armful of menu cards. Her face was troubled, her lips grim.

"Please," she said impatiently, "go around to the back."

The young man gave her a startled look. "That's not exactly what I had in mind," he said, grinning.

"Please," the girl said, "I haven't time to argue with you. The kitchen's in the back. Tell Duncan I sent you."

The young man stood uncertainly for a moment, then he shrugged and went out. At the back of the mill he found the kitchen door, and entered.

A short, heavy-set man, bald as an egg, was overseeing two
