

Devotions at Noon

Story and photos: Harold J. Flecknoe from Monk Meyer

WHEN THE LUNCH BELL rings in the engine overhaul shop of a large airline at Washington National airport, employees reach for their Bibles and their food at the same time. They are members of an informal Bible study group formed to bring religion more intimately into their daily lives.

As the sounds of the machines die down, the men gather in a group and bow their heads while one of them reads a verse from the Bible. Once a week, pastors of various denominations come to speak at their devotions.

The meetings were started by Robert Pandolfi, a mechanic, and a number of his fellow workers in the shop. Soon they spread throughout the organization, with groups meeting on the night shift as well. Pandolfi says the devotions are awakening interest in religion across the country. Factory workers in Wisconsin and Virginia, for example, have set up programs similar to that of the airline.

Their lunch finished, airline Bible group listens attentively to discussion of text.
