Results Of Tests Indicate Vitamin E Can End Spasms

By DELOS SMITH, UPI Science Editor. NEW YORK (UPI) — Medical science may be in the process of reversing itself on the use of vitamin "E" in treating spasms in the surface blood vessels of people's legs.

Nine years ago a medical scientist found this obscure vitamin relieved those spasms in a number of victims. This caused a medical stir because those spasms cause a painful lameness and can lead to such blood starvation in the legs they have to be amputated to avoid gangrene.

Other scientists tried out vitamin E in other victims. Some couldn't verify the hopeful results; others verified them only in part. Medical interest slipped. But now it has been revived with a bang. Results of a "blind test" strongly indicate the vitamin can end those spasms.

The test was made by Drs. Peter D. Livingstone and Clifford Jones in 40 men who had had the spasms for years and some of whom were in a bad way in their legs as the result. Twenty of the 40 got vitamin E in heavy daily doses for 40 weeks. The other 20 got pills which looked exactly like the vitamin pills but were chemically blank.

Neither doctors nor patients knew which patients were getting the vitamin E until the end of the experiment when the identifying code was "broken." While the experiment was going on, every effort was made to spot the results, if any, as they appeared.

But that's hard. The victim feels the spasm if he has his leg as the result. Twenty of the 40 got vitamin E in heavy daily doses for 40 weeks. The other 20 got pills which looked exactly like the vitamin pills but were chemically blank.

At this point a deer appeared on the highway and McGinnis started to pull around it. However, the deer then turned back and ran in front of his vehicle. McGinnis applied his brakes and hit the deer only with his bumper, but meanwhile the rear car jackknifed and came off its tow bar, rolling over once. The hardtop was considerably damaged but McGinnis' car had only slight rear end damage.

weight on his legs, but the result of an individual spasm is not detectable by the doctor. The doctor sees only the damage continuing spasms do to blood vessels by breaking them down slowly.

So the men were required to walk up two steep steps and then turn and walk down them. This was done daily and they kept walking until the laming pain appeared, indicating spasm. In that way, there was an "objective" measurement of whether spasms decreased during the experimental period.

During the experiment three men were lost from each set of 20 because they died or their illness became more crippling. Of the remaining 17 who got the vitamin, 13 considered they were improved and four noted no change in their condition. Of the 17 who took the chemical blank, two thought they were improved and 15 were sure they weren't.

Livingstone and Jones experimented because the results of previous experiments seemed contradictory to them. They thought heavy doses over a considerable period were needed if there was going to be an effect. What the E vitamin has to do with the tone of blood vessels, science doesn't know — it is one of the many secrets of body chemistry science hopes to lay bare, with persistent striving.

Deer Provokes Freak Accident

A deer provoked a freak accident one mile south of Chemult Monday night, wrecking one car and slightly damaging another.

State police report that a southbound convertible, operated by Junior R. McGinnis, 34, 2132 Southeast 156th Street, Portland, had a 1957 hardtop in tow, going 40 to 45 miles an hour in a heavy rain.

At this point a deer appeared on the highway and McGinnis started to pull around it. However, the deer then turned back and ran in front of his vehicle. McGinnis applied his brakes and hit the deer only with his bumper, but meanwhile the rear car jackknifed and came off its tow bar, rolling over once. The hardtop was considerably damaged but McGinnis' car had only slight rear end damage.

McCLOUD — Local officials of the USFS announced that 400 bucks were validated by game wardens and USFS personnel during the past season. The tally was identical to the number validated last year, they said. Other tags were mailed without being checked through the local ranger station, as was done in previous years and no total of the number of bucks taken in the district is presently available.
