Any Shelter Aid In Blast

PHILADELPHIA (UPI) — Even a small degree of protection against a nuclear blast can spell the difference between life and death—even near ground zero.

According to Harry Lake Bowman, Dean of the Faculty of Drexel Institute of Technology and Consultant on Weapon Effects and Protective Construction for the Atomic Energy Commission, there is a ring around ground zero where even a little protection would help reduce the effects of an atomic explosion.

Bowman said a poor shelter would be better than none. "In a fallout field," he said, "a poor structure will cut the radiation dosage in half, and the below-ground basement of a good structure may reduce the dosage by a factor of a thousand."
