As You Were Saying...

They Went That-a-Way

SEVERAL YEARS AGO, when we were transferred out West, an Indian friend of ours and his son offered to move some of our furniture for us. They were proud of their heritage and thought the trip would give them an opportunity to see more of the country of Indian legend.

En route they stopped at many places of historic interest, including the site of Custer's last stand. When they returned home they regaled us with tales of Indian lore.

"But," said the son, obviously disappointed, "when we stopped at Little Big Horn, a man said there weren't any wild Indians around there any more."—Dorothy P. Mowery, Sarasota, Fla.

Present by Proxy

RECENTLY, MY HUSBAND and I were feeling badly because we couldn't attend my brother's wedding, which was to take place more than 2,000 miles away. We sent our gifts, along with regrets.

A week or so after the honeymoon, we received, instead of the usual "thank you" card, a package. Its contents? Reels and reels of film. They had taken movies of the preparations, the church ceremony, the reception, and everything else.

It was one of the most pleasant surprises—and nicest gestures—we've ever seen.—Mrs. B. E. Martin, Rapid City, S. D.

The Price of Learning

WE WERE SHOPPING in an office-supply store when a young couple, in their 20s, came in and asked to look at some second-hand typewriters. As they inspected the machines, the girl explained that they were going to college—he was studying engineering, and she chemistry—and they needed a typewriter to submit their assignments properly.

The owner listened attentively and, after they decided on a $30 machine but were having trouble getting together the required amount, he said, "We need more people like you in this country. So the price to you is $20. Study well and make our future secure!"—Mrs. Jules Oravetz, Racine, Wis.
