Building City To Last Is Time Wasted

THE HAGUE, Holland (UPI) — An American professor started a lively argument at the First International Seminar on Urban Renewal by going on record in favor of "disposable cities" — made of structures built for short-term use.

Dr. J. Marshall Miller of Columbia University told town planning experts from 22 countries:

"Too many people try to build buildings for all eternity. We should design structures, perhaps whole cities, to be written off more quickly."

"Since peoples' needs for housing change from generation to generation, we ought to plan a disposable city rather than attempt to make our cities into monuments."

Dr. Miller urged the building of schools of a simple and temporary structure.

"I am appalled," he said, "at the monument-building going on in new schools, when we know that school needs will change within a generation."

But many of Prof. Miller's fellow planners objected vigorously. Gabriel Andrade, City Planning Director of Bogota, Colombia, said studies made in his country had shown that housing built to last only 10 years cost three-quarters as much as a house built to last 50 years.

Claude H. Boistiere, Inspector of Planning and Housing for The French Ministry of Reconstruction and Housing, declared that so-called temporary housing too often turns into permanent housing, as has been the case with temporary housing built in France after World War I in war-damaged areas and still in use today.
