

Hawaii Congress Delegate Top Democrat In State

WASHINGTON (AP) — A one-time policeman, milkman and liquor store proprietor has emerged as Hawaii's No. 1 Democratic party political figure.

He is John Anthony Burns, serving his second term as Hawaii's lone delegate to Congress.

He'd like to become one of the new state's first senators, but hasn't yet decided whether to run.

Congressmen of both political parties have described as courageous and statesmanlike his part in the strategy that won statehood for both Alaska and Hawaii.

Burns decided upon entering Congress in 1957 after Hawaii's first Democratic election sweep in decades—that the success of statehood bills for Hawaii and Alaska depended on keeping them separated.

At the risk of adverse political reaction at home, Burns agreed that the practical political situation demanded that Alaska go first.

It was a bitter pill for Hawaii to swallow. Hawaii had been petitioning for statehood longer than Alaska and felt a proprietary interest in the 49th star.

But Burns resisted all urgings, despite charges by his political enemies that he was a traitor to the Hawaii statehood cause.

"I had faith in the intelligence of the people of Hawaii," Burns said. "I believed they would understand the reason for what was being done."

With Alaska in, and Hawaii still out, Burns was reelected to a second term last November.

Burns, nearing 50, is a lean six-footer with gray hair fringing a bald spot. Through regular exercise he has managed to maintain the physical trim achieved during 11½ years on the Honolulu police force.

Burns was born in March 30, 1909, in Ft. Assiniboine, Mont., the oldest of four children of an infantry sergeant who took him to Hawaii at age 4.

Marine Reserve Plan Told By Recruiter

High school students who face military service can spend a portion of their enlistment period while attending school, according to word released by the Medford Marine Corps Recruiting office.

They can enlist in the Marine Corps reserve up to four months before they must report for active duty.

The plan means more pay, too, when enlistees report for active duty. More information is available from the Klamath County recruiter who will be at the Selective Service office Fridays.

The plan is available to women, too.
