Irradiated Seafoods Under Study At Oregon State College Center

OREGON STATE COLLEGE — Preserving seafoods by irradiation, a by-product of atomic fission, could extend the market for fresh Oregon crab and provide fresh fish for Army menus in distant areas of the world.

A new $14,000 grant from the Quartermaster Food and Container Institute has been made to Oregon State College to investigate irradiation-preservation of seafoods for armed forces use.

Precooked seafoods, including fish sticks, shrimp, smoked sablefish and smoked cod will be tested in the study. Fish will be treated with high dosages of gamma rays, the atomic rays that will kill spoilage organisms and permit storage of foods without refrigeration.

Fish will be shipped frozen to the materials testing reactor at Idaho Falls, Idaho, and the Quartermaster Ionizing Radiation Center at Dugway, Utah. In tests, fish will be "shot" with high frequency rays, then returned to OSC food and technology department for six months storage at "tropical" temperatures of 100 degrees F., and two years at 70 degrees F., or room temperature.

Previous tests at OSC on irradiated oysters, crab, shrimp, kippered sturgeon and sablefish were completed last year with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. "Taste testers" could detect little or no difference between treated and untreated seafoods. According to Russell Sinnhuber, food technologist in charge of the project, irradiation has little or no effects on the nutritive value of foods, any more than usual processing methods.

OSC has one of the most diversified programs underway on irradiation in the United States. Sinnhuber noted. Projects at OSC include research in meats, seafoods, a bacteriology program, and a wholesomeness testing of irradiated foods using rats. Consumer acceptance of irradiated foods is tested in college laboratories by four taste testing panels.

SALUTED

George Washington's 500-acre estate on the Potomac in Virginia, Mount Vernon, is saluted by each U.S. Navy vessel that passes.
