Scribe Tells Of Tricky Alaska Landing

By CHARLES R. MOORE

SPARREVOHN, Alaska (UPI)—Maj. John S. Kupko, a husky man with crew-cut black hair and eyes that match the blue of his Air Force uniform, is one of a group of pilots whose work takes them to the ends of the earth.

But, he said, "there's no place like this in the entire world."

The 38-year-old MATS transport pilot didn't have time to say much more.

He was wrestling his four-engine Globemaster, which has the approximate dimensions of an Iowa hay barn, onto a mountain-locked airstrip that didn't look as if it should welcome anything bigger than a Piper Cub.

Thirty two hundred feet long, narrower than the 174-foot wing spread of the Globemaster, it was the airstrip at Sparrevohn, site of two vitally important military and civilian radar and communications stations.

One of these not only could locate enemy aircraft but could direct United States planes to the precise point to intercept them. Another part is a unique military and civilian radio communications system, White Alice, that links the far-flung cities and towns of the 49th state. They are a story in themselves. The Globemasters help supply them.

The runway is eight degrees uphill from the approach end, with the other end up against a 3,000-foot mountain, the stations are on its peak.

"Once you come through the gap, and get your wheels and flaps down about two miles out," Kupko had said earlier, "you're committed. One way or another, you're going to land. There is no room to turn around in the air."

For a few moments the plane bounced, dropped and shuddered as it hit the turbulent air close to the ground. Then suddenly we were on, and came quickly to a stop although the wind was behind us. The hill usually makes brakes or prop reversal unnecessary.

"The landing is automatic," said Kupko. "There is much more in taking off."

After unloading cargo and turning around, he showed what he meant while the passengers sweated. Pieces of wreckage from two that didn't make it are near the runway.

But without cargo and with the wind in its nose, the Globemaster surged smoothly back into the air. It was early evening then, and the afternoon turbulence had subsided.

A non-pilot passenger told Kupko:

"You make it look so easy I think I could do it myself." Kupko laughed, then turned back to continue a highly technical discussion with a pilot who had been along to observe.

"Keep your power high to handle the turbulence and downdraft. When you chop the power she lands herself."

Virginia Needs A Santa Claus

RENO, Nev. (AP)—A car was left abandoned on a street here and parking tickets began piling up.

Then police found in the glove compartment a note from Virginia Smith of Portland, Ore., saying she was running out of money and had to take a bus home.

The note told authorities to inform a California bank, the legal owner of the car, where the auto was.

Miss Smith wrote in her note that she tried three different garages without being able to get a fuel pump fixed.

Forest Survey Leader Named

PORTLAND (AP) — The federal forest survey program in Oregon and Washington will be taken over next month by Melvin E. Metcalf, who will be transferred here from Ogden.

Metcalf has been project leader for forest survey work in the intermountain area since 1951.

Robert W. Cowlin, director of the Pacific Northwest Forest and Range Experiment Station for the Forest Service, said Metcalf would start his new job May 18.
