a child's world of nature

FOR SOME TIME, Arline Strong doubled as a New York housewife and topnotch fashion photographer. But in recent years, with the coming of her own two sons, she began to focus more and more on children as subjects for her lens.

Mrs. Strong was particularly drawn to picture those magic moments when a child first discovers the wonders of the natural world around him. "I try to record not only what the children are doing, but how they feel about it," she says.

Her photographs catch the wonder of a child discovering "the texture of a rock, his delight in tickle weeds, the contented curl of two little figures lying in the grass, the spontaneous joy as a boy swings on a branch or throws his hands in the air with sheer delight on the hillside."

A group of her pictures, titled "A Child's World of Nature," recently was exhibited at the American Museum of Natural History in New York.

Mrs. Strong's sons, Ricky and Johnny, were shown in most of them. The photographs were made in New York and along the coast of Maine.
