WHAT'S YOUR PHOBIA?

by Al Ostrow

MONOPHOBIA
Fear of being alone

BACTERIOPHOBIA
Fear of germs

APHEPHOBIA
Fear of being touched

DO YOU HAVE any phobias? Of course you do. Everyone is somewhat afraid of something—usually many things. There's nothing really wrong with having a phobia, unless it becomes an obsession. It's perfectly normal to have several mild phobias, whether you recognize them or not.

A phobia is a combination of dislike and fear. It can be an instinctive reaction or result from experience.

Anyone standing on a wind-swept precipice feels a natural surge of bathophobia, or fear of falling from very high places.

The child who is frightened by a scratching cat may grow up to be an ailurophobe, or cat hater. One barking dog can make a dozen cynophobes, or dog dreaders.

Intense fear is a strong emotion that can drive an individual into quivering terror or raging violence. But psychiatrists have found that mild fears—including hundreds of phobias—are harmless.

See how many of these mild phobias you can recognize in yourself, your family, or your friends. If you want to know the medical-psychiatric name for each idiosyncrasy, check the list below.

1. Fear of germs. These phobes are constantly washing their hands. An uncovered sneeze worries them. In a restaurant, people with this fear wipe silverware with a napkin before using it.

2. Fear of children. The mere presence of small fry makes these people edgy. Some who live near schools and playgrounds are constantly protesting the noise and frivolity. They don't like to be reminded they once were children themselves.

3. Fear of sunlight. When they go to the beach such individuals hide under big umbrellas to avert the possibility of sunburn. They pull down their shades to bar sunlight from their homes.

4. Fear of lightning. An electrical storm makes them want to run and hide.

5. Fear of noise. These folks are very unhappy in this age of jet planes, rumbling trucks, juke boxes, and blaring radio and television sets.

6. Fear of snakes. A rattlesnake or cobra may be deadly, but these phobes are even frightened by a harmless garden worm.

7. Fear of being stared at. It makes these persons nervous to have anyone look in their direction. Some get physically sick when they are compelled to stand up and address an audience.

8. Fear of being touched. They are horrified by the impersonal jostling of a crowd. Even a handshake annoys them. A slap on the back makes their tempers flare.

9. Fear of travel. These persons don't respond to the lure of faraway places. The thought of visiting a city five miles distant frightens them.

10. Fear of trains. "Me get on one of those iron monsters? No, sir, not me!"
