

America Changing Role In Economics Of World

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The United States could be compared to a town's biggest merchant who, after years without serious competition, now sees smaller, energetic merchants once again displaying their wares.

The big merchant doesn't panic. In fact, he says he's happy to see the little fellows battling back.

Change the town merchant to world merchant and manufacturer, and you have this:

The United States, although still the world's biggest exporter and manufacturer, has lost ground in both fields in the past 10 years as the productive systems of smaller free world countries recover from World War II.

Ten years ago the United States accounted for nearly one-fourth of the free world's exports. Last year, according to the National Industrial Conference Board, the United States share had dropped to 19 per cent—only 2 per cent above 1928 and four per cent higher than 1938.

Of the free world's manufactured goods, the United States produced 56 per cent in 1948. Last year, its share had fallen to 46 per cent, which the conference board says is two per cent larger than the 1928 portion and seven per cent higher than 1938.

The declines of the last 10 years, however, have had little noticeable effect on the United States economy as a whole. It still is the world's healthiest.

But a change has taken place. Explains John S. Sinclair, president of the conference board, a non-profit, independent organization specializing in economic data:

More recently, our relationship to the rest of the world has taken on a new aspect. Our domestic economy has expanded; so have our international trade and investments in foreign countries.

But our predominant world role has receded. Today we face a growing number of foreign economies that are strong, vigorous, and able to produce sufficiently for themselves—and even more.

In large part, through the aid and encouragement, financial and otherwise, that we have extended, one nation after another has been added to the roster of sturdy competitors for world markets—and our own.

Since 1953, United States exports have grown about 10 per cent. Japan, meanwhile, has increased its exports in the same period by 140 per cent and West Germany by 100 per cent.

Although providing 19 per cent of the world's total exports, the United States exports only six per cent of its total output of goods and services.

The Netherlands, on the other hand, exports nearly half of its total output, while Belgium and Switzerland export about a third.

While the United States generally regards lightly its decline in world trade and manufacturing, some businessmen have expressed fear that the decline may continue.

They base their apprehension on the new European Common Market, the possibility that the United States may be pricing itself out of the world market, and the threat of the Soviet Union increasing its trade with free world countries.

The economic market, which lies together West Germany, France, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg, is possibly one of the most important economic moves in European history.

It gives preferential tariff and import quotas to members; provides a unified system to buy new products and develop markets in underdeveloped countries, and jointly puts the six countries in direct economic competition with the United States.

All American businessmen, however, do not regard these economic problems as any great danger to the United States' position in world trade and manufacturing.

Rather, they contend more dynamic competition will result in higher production, consumption and incomes for Americans.
