

WORTHWHILE TRIP — Klamath Falls summer visitor, Charles Davidson, poses with a string of crappie he caught at Gerber Dam on a recent excursion with his uncle, Buck Davidson. Chuck hails from Mountain Home, Idaho, but says he likes our fishing.

Some 300 Oregon hunters will have an opportunity to hunt deer in the fabulous Hart Mountain country this fall. A quota of 300 antlerless deer tags has been set for the area to be issued by the game commission on a drawing basis.

Archery hunters, who normally have a regular season on the refuge, may file application for the tags along with those who prefer to hunt with rifle. The antlerless tag gives the hunter an opportunity to take two deer during the hunting season, one antlerless animal and another on his regular deer tag.

The archery season on Hart Mountain will extend from September 12 through September 20. Archers successful in drawing an antlerless tag may take two deer during the season, one on the antlerless tag and one of either sex on the regular deer tag.

On September 26 and 27 the area will be open to rifle hunters successful in drawing antlerless deer permits for the area. No buck hunting with rifles will be allowed on the refuge this fall. However, rifle hunters may take an additional deer during the regular season on their general deer tag.

A fee of $5 is charged for the antlerless tags, which must be submitted with the applications.

Reports from Happy Camp, in the Klamath River area, state that although the creeks in the area are good the river fishing is better. The big catches are being hooked on Colorado spinners, however, flies, salmon eggs and worms are also working out very well.
