

Car-Topping Device Is Boon To Boat Enthusiast

How to transport the water boats considered too cumbersome to be loaded atop a car by one person, but not large enough to justify the cost of a trailer, has until now been a constant source of irritation to the average boating enthusiast.

The Market Forge Company of Everett, Massachusetts, has come up with a device specifically engineered to solve this problem.

Called the "Boat-Veyor," the device makes possible the single-handed loading and unloading of a craft up to 14-feet long, and weighing 200-pounds.

Here's how it works:

A small wheel is attached to the boat's bow.

The boat is flipped over and rolled right up a mono-rail to the top of the car.

The mono-rail folds under the boat.

The boat is lashed down and that's it!

To transfer the boat from the car roof to the water, the process is reversed.

Retail price is $42.50.

British Mark 11 Years Of Health Plan

LONDON (UPI)—Britain's "cradle to the grave" health program marks its 11th anniversary in July and, although it still has its critics, its political success can be measured by the fact that both parties claim they thought of it first.

Because the scheme was introduced in 1948 during a Labor government, it is generally referred to outside Britain, and sometimes inside too, as socialized medicine.

In any event, it works this way: Adults pay nine shillings, eleven pence weekly (about $1.40) as their contributions to old age and unemployment insurance as well as complete health coverage for themselves and their dependents.

This entitles them to medical, dental, surgical and optical care, hospital or sanatorium treatment, and so on. In fact, anything that might happen to a person's health from birth to death is provided for almost completely without cost.

At first, everything was free. But because some patients tended to abuse the right to demand medical attention, small charges were levied on certain services—for example, one shilling or 14 cents on each prescription and various small sums for full sets of false teeth, spectacles, wigs and other apparatus.

The cost of the nation's health services in 1959 is estimated at 695,000,000 sterling ($1,046,000,000).

This is considerably more than original estimates and committees are constantly considering how the cost can be controlled. Where drugs are of equal efficacy doctors are encouraged to prescribe the cheaper and patent medicines sometimes have to prove they can do what their advertisements say before they are eligible to be prescribed.

Britons are the second longest-lived people on earth—next to the Dutch—and have never been healthier, according to recent vital statistics. This is cited as a reply to the many who criticize the way the health program is being run.

It should be made clear that very few of these critics want the scheme abandoned in favor of private medicine. Their complaints center mainly on details.

Doctors once vaguely threatened to strike because they felt they were not getting enough money. They were given a raise. Health scheme officials say that it is true some doctors do not make as much

Oil Company Launches Program Aimed At Making Public Aware Of Wildlife

A new public service program aimed at arousing public interest in wildlife conservation got underway in the Far West recently under the sponsorship of Standard Oil Company of California.

Some 200,000 colorful posters bearing a conservation message as they did in private practice—but on the other hand many doctors who barely could scrape along are now earning a living.

The major opposition to the health scheme is centered in a group of 2,000 doctors banded into the Fellowship for Freedom in Medicine—which describes itself as a "large minority" of the 20,000 practicing doctors in Britain.

The fellowship is not opposed to a national health service as such but believes the present setup transfers the burden of treatment from the family doctor to the hospital. It is "too institutional," it says.

It also believes the system of payment to doctors by the number of patients on his books tends to detract from the family doctor relationship.

In place of the present health scheme, it would like to see a system of private health insurance subsidized by the state.

were mailed to western schools and national parks, for display on bulletin boards and at park gate houses. Similar messages will be featured on outdoor panels on the way to wildlife areas and at company service stations.

Explaining the objective of the program, Board Chairman R. G. Follis said:

"Wildlife conservation is the responsibility of all of us citizens, whether individual or corporate. As the population of the West continues to grow and encroaches on our forested areas, each of us must exert a special effort to guarantee that wildlife and wildlife areas are managed not only for the general present benefit, but for the enjoyment and use of generations to come."

The conservation theme will also be featured in the 1959-60 school year on the Standard School Broadcast, the regular weekly music appreciation program sponsored by the company for school children. A large pictograph map of the United States, depicting principal wildlife areas, will accompany the School Broadcast Teachers' Manual which is provided to teachers as a guide for in-class listening.

Wildlife conservation is the third public service program undertaken by Standard in recent years. The company previously carried out campaigns in support of traffic safety and roadside cleanliness.
