High Altitude Research To Be Financed

OREGON STATE COLLEGE - Special laboratory equipment that simulates high altitude atmospheric conditions is being used by an Oregon State College physicist for basic research on radio wave transmission problems found at 100,000 foot heights.

Dr. James J. Brady is making the study under grants from Boeing Airplane Company of Seattle.

He received a $14,000 grant last year for the project and a renewal grant of $12,000 this month to continue work for a second year.

A breakdown in radio wave transmission occurs in high altitude missile flights because of differences in atmospheric pressure, Dr. Brady explains. The failure is a result of the fact that air at reduced pressure loses some of its electrical insulating properties, he said.

The breakdown is a complex problem that complicates flights at heights from 100,000 to 200,000 feet, he pointed out. Effects of high speeds on the breakdown problem also need consideration.

Brady's basic research is aimed at determining conditions that produce electrical breakdown in gases at relatively low pressures. The simpler gases - helium and neon - are being studied first but the molecular gases such as nitrogen and oxygen will be worked with later.

In the research, the gases are being circulated through a closed container at flow speeds approaching that of sound. Much of the equipment was specially built for the study in the physics department shops.
