Sugar Beet Feeding Okay

Sugar beets can provide useful feed for livestock. So reports Tulalake Farm Adviser Ken Bagholt of the University of California. He points out that some 3,000 acres of sugar beets have been planted in excess of allotments this year. These excess beets—if they are not eventually covered by reallocation of acreage from other areas—cannot be marketed for sugar extraction.

The value of sugar beets, on a fresh weight basis, is estimated to be: If the price of alfalfa hay is $25 per ton, the sugar beet tops have a value of $4.13 per ton and the roots $6.16 per ton. One way of feeding sugar beets to livestock is by strip grazing. An area of the field is fenced off, and the cattle are allowed to pasture down the crop. Then the roots are lifted and the cattle feed on them. Or a strip of beets is plowed out and cattle feed on the wilted tops and the roots.

The tops can be silaged, baled, or stacked dry. The roots also can be stored and fed later. They should be harvested late in the fall. Then they can be stored in low racks covered with hay or straw. Temperatures in the covered rack should be no higher than 55 degrees. While the tops can be made into satisfactory silage, the roots may present more difficult problems because of their higher moisture content.

More information on feeding sugar beets to livestock can be obtained from the farm advisers office, Tulalake.
