11 Per Cent Wage Boost Predicted By Red Aide

MOSCOW (UPI)—Victor Grishin, secretary of the Soviet Trade Unions, told the Supreme Soviet (Parliament) today the average wage would go up by 11 per cent next year and that the Soviet Union within another year would boast the world's shortest work week. He also claimed the Soviet social welfare system was the best in the world and said competitive co-existence would prove the overall superiority of the socialist over capitalist economy.

The discussion of Russia's 1960 budget today followed the customary pattern with speaker after speaker rising to approve it though pointing out minor deficiencies and shortcomings.

Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev listened to most of the debate on the 186 billion dollar budget, which was expected to get unanimous approval.

Although spending of this magnitude would cause weeks of debate in a Western parliament, the 1,378 Supreme Soviet members were giving it a day and a half. No one doubted that they will end the discussions with unanimous approval, since that is what generally happens to measures introduced by Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev's government.

The budget keeps defense spending at its present level—24 billion dollars—but because of increased amounts for science and welfare state benefits, the defense percentage fell from 19.9 to 12 compared to last year.

Science appropriations—which could cover many items useful for defense—were raised 15 per cent to $8,200,000,000. Housing, consumer goods, pensions, education, culture, and health all were increased.

Even though the Soviet legislators were spending less time questioning the budget than their counterparts in Western parliaments do, there was some criticism of the way money was being spent that would have sounded at home in the U.S. Congress.

Delegate D. Senin said bureaucrats were buying too much fancy office furniture and complained that the Ministry of Culture alone had more than a million dollars' worth. Delegate A. Yasnov wondered why a tractor made in the state plant at Kharkov cost $5,000 and a Stalingrad-made tractor only $3,500.

The Premier of the Ukraine pointed out that his republic needed a gas pipeline from Dushava to Kiev. The Communist chief of Georgia asked Moscow for more help in housing and power plants for farms.

The members of the two houses, the Union Council and the Nationalities Council, win their offices as a reward for achievement on the farm, battlefield, or production line.

Peasant women wearing kerchiefs sat next to generals in gold braid and medals. Asian peasants mixed with blond North Russian factory workers.
