Kingsley Field Officers Pitch In To Renovate Club

Officers of Kingsley Field will sport a modern club next week because of their own ingenuity and hard work.

During the past six weeks, members of the base Officers' Open Mess have pitched in with hammers, saws and ideas to give their 14-year-old club building a much needed face lifting.

"The building hadn't been remodeled since it was built for the Navy in 1945," 1st Lt. John L. Gentile, who served as architectural engineer and construction supervisor for the project, said, "the place looked like a big barn or a gymnasium." Lieutenant Gentile, a graduate of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, conceived the plans which will change a large 40x50-foot area into three smaller and more serviceable rooms.

He explained that the Officers' Open Mess is a self supporting voluntary association. The Air Force provides a building and a club officer or manager but the members bear the entire financial burden, the lieutenant said.

The club's Board of Governors, under the direction of Lt. Col. John J. Scott, voted on a complete renovation of the club several months ago. The board realized that enough money was not available to let the job out to a contractor. The solution was to purchase supplies and materials locally and appeal to club members to provide the necessary manpower.

"The response was gratifying," Lieutenant Gentile said. "We had officers working five nights a week and all day Saturdays. Every colonel on the base has helped on the job including Col. Jack W. Williams, base commander." Lieutenant Gentile singled out Lt. Col. Lloyd W. LeMay, Maj. Carl H. Vineyard, Capt. Arnold E. Koneza and honorary club member Elton Smith for the extra time and effort they spent on the project. Smith is manager of the Town and Country Branch of the United States National Bank.

An open house and party will be held in the club next Friday night to celebrate completion of the remodeling. Guests will see a mahogany bar area, a lounge and a decorated dance floor. Mrs. LeMay, a member of the Officers' Wives Club, has been in charge of interior decorations. Other improvements in the club are a new

Traffic Guided By Reflectors

Color coded delineators are being used to guide traffic on Oregon's interstate highways, according to an announcement made here by W. C. Williams, state highway engineer.

The delineators are white reflectors mounted on white posts at 200-foot intervals along the right hand edge of through roadways, and yellow reflectors on yellow colored posts along acceleration and deceleration lanes at interchanges. Easily visible by day, the same delineators are equipped with three inch prismatic reflectors which, under normal weather and atmospheric conditions, can be seen for a distance of 1,000 feet at night when they are illuminated by the upper beam of standard automobile headlights.

On deceleration and acceleration lanes and the ramps of interchanges the delineators are spaced at 100-foot intervals. The state highway department paints the posts a bright yellow for daylight recognition, and equips each post with a pair of yellow reflectors for recognition at night.

The change from single white to double yellow reflectors make it clear to the motorist that he is approaching a point of exit from the freeway, Williams said. He added that triple amber reflectors are used to mark the end of acceleration lanes when entering the freeway. These are placed so the viewer has adequate time to adjust to the flow of main highway traffic.

Recommendations Set On Water Develop Plan

SACRAMENTO (UPI)—Gov. Edmund G. Brown will get formal recommendations from the State Department of Water Resources by Jan. 1, 1960 on controversial issues connected with the California Water Development plan.

Department Director Harvey O. Banks made this announcement Friday during an Assembly Water Committee hearing. Banks declined to say what he would tell the governor about unjust enrichment, acreage limitations, power pricing and subsidies for agricultural water users.

But he indicated he was opposed to agricultural subsidies.

The subsidy issue came up after John R. Teerink, principal hydraulic engineer for Banks' department, told the committee that farmers in the Fresno, Kings and Tulare County areas should be able to pay between $12 and $15 an acre foot for state developed water measures at canalside.

But supporters of a state subsidy have argued that farmers would be unable to pay this price and would be excused from the state's $1,750,000,000 water program, which voters must approve in November, 1960.

Farmers in the three county area mentioned by Teerink now pay $3.50 an acre foot for water from the Federal Bureau of Reclamation.

During an intermission at Friday's hearing, Banks was asked about the conflict in payment capacity rates. He agreed that his department's estimate argued strongly against a subsidy.

Asked if he would carry that view to the governor, he replied, "You could say that."

The committee, headed by Assemblyman Carley V. Porter (D-Compton) also heard testimony from William P. Price, general manager for the United Water Conservation District of Ventura County.

Price, like two earlier witnesses, argued against acreage limitations on farms whose owners would contract for state water imported into their districts.

"Any attempt to exclude holders of more than 160 acres from participation in the importation program would merely mean that they would continue to draw on local supplies to meet their needs without contributing to the cost of the program," Price said.

Others speaking against acreage limitations were Richard Johnson Jr., executive secretary of the Agricultural Council of California, and James F. Sorensen, secretary and consulting engineer for the Friant Water Users Association.
