Capitalism Out, But Still There

By ALBERT E. KAFF

TAIPEI (UPI)—Capitalistic practices still lurk in Communist China's mass labor communes.

Nationalist Chinese officials report that the Reds have watered down some of the pure Marxism they attempted to inject into their revolutionary experiment with human labor.

The Sixth Department (mainland intelligence) of Formosa's ruling Kuomintang (Nationalist Party) told United Press International the Communists have retreated from their goals to the extent that they:

—Permit commune husbands and wives to live together.

—Pay some commune members for part of their labor.

—Allow private markets to operate in commune areas.

—Encourage commune workers to engage in private home production in such fields as handicrafts and raising livestock.

—Permit communes to barter among themselves for tools and other equipment which the government was supposed to provide.

The full-dress commune system—the epitome of "womb to tomb" socialism—is being practiced in only a few showcase camps, according to Kuomintang officials who are studying life behind the bamboo curtain.

But the Communists still plan to convert all China to pure communes, the Kuomintang says.

The Kuomintang believes that Peiping failed in its original attempt to carry out with whiplash speed what would be one of the most far-reaching social revolutions ever conceived by man.

The Communists, in the Formosa view, slowed down because they were plagued by inadequate transportation and breakdowns in agricultural and industrial production plans.

Also, farmers were not happy over the prospect of being uprooted from their ancestral land, the Kuomintang says.

So the Reds retreated a few steps and allowed commune members more private dealings than originally intended.

Small salaries, usually less than one dollar a month, were paid to allow commune farmers to purchase clothes, vegetables and meat when the government could not supply them.

Dormitories in which husbands and wives were supposed to live apart except for an hour or so every two weeks have not been built in most communes, and married couples continue to live at home.

But the Kuomintang believes that Peiping views these "capitalistic" practices as temporary expedients.

The Nationalists consider them unimportant because the Communists' ultimate goal, the Nationalists insist, remains the same: convert all China into a mass labor camp.

CAN THEY SPARE IT?

BUFFALO, N.Y. (UPI)—Thieves who smashed through two doors of an elementary school in the town of Tonawanda, broke into a safe and a cafeteria cash register man- aged to escape with just one dime.
