Sewage Pool Study Slated

OREGON STATE COLLEGE — Satisfactory operation since 1958 of an oxidation lagoon for disposal of sewage and industrial waste has brought a new three-year grant to Oregon State College for additional studies on how the low-cost lagoons might be used best in the future by communities and small industries of Western Oregon.

The lagoons are widely used in the Midwest and Southwest but their use in high rainfall regions has been limited by lack of knowledge. The OSC experiment, started in 1958 with the cooperation of the city of Corvallis and the state sanitary authority, was the first to be tried in this type climate.

The new grant to the OSC engineering experiment station is for $27,000 from the National Institutes of Health. It will be used for studies of lagoon design, loading capacity, and other operational problems and possibilities.

Fred J. Burgess, associate professor of civil engineering, is project leader. Working with him is Martin Northcraft of the civil engineering staff together with graduate and undergraduate students.

Inexpensive to build and operate, the lagoons have found favor with small communities and industries which are unable to afford sewage treatment plants. Other larger communities are using them to expand existing facilities, Burgess noted. Reductions in sewage disposal costs of from $10 to $20 per capita have been reported.

The experimental lagoon is 2.3 acres in size with varying depths to three feet. It is constructed adjacent to the Corvallis sewage treatment plant. Various loading rates that would meet the needs of communities or small industries have been tried and found feasible in the preliminary research.
