Control Of Starling In State Good

Oregon is making satisfactory progress in its starling control program.

Frank McKennon, director of agriculture, made this statement January 15 following a meeting of the overall committee on predator control. Also represented on the committee are the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the State Game Commission and the Extension Service.

Concentrations of this nuisance bird have been found in various places in eastern, southern and western Oregon.

Holly growers, the committee reported, were able to harvest their crops without damage. Whether the starling control program had anything to do with this may remain a tongue-in-cheek question until someone proves that these birds can read. In any event, the birds didn't move onto the holly orchards until after harvest this past season!

McKennon says the State Department of Agriculture at Salem is receiving quite a few inquiries about the starling program.

"Actually, in this program we are utilizing the talent and experience of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service under a cooperative agreement," McKennon explains. For that reason, and for the most direct information, queries should be sent directly to Melvin D. Smith, district agent, predator and rodent control, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, O'd U.S. Courthouse, Portland.

The 1959 Legislature, which set up the appropriation for starling controls, classified starlings as predators.

FRANK TALK

MONTPELIER, Vt. (UPI)—Rep. George H. Brush, 74, said during debate on a mental health bill that "four-fifths of the members of this House are mentally retarded and they don't know it."
