

Budget Fight May Begin In Capitol

WASHINGTON (AP)—A House-passed 900-million-dollar anti-pollution bill may formally touch off the 1960 battle of the budget between President Eisenhower and the Democratic-controlled Congress.

Passed Tuesday by the House, the Senate-House compromise far exceeds the President's proposals. It may be the first big bill to draw a veto this year.

Senate action may not come until next week or later, but approval by that body is almost certain since the Senate previously had passed a measure almost as expensive.

The House acted by voice vote, without audible dissent. Republicans didn't oppose the bill, although they said they didn't approve it. Their attitude apparently was that the sooner it reached the White House the sooner it could be vetoed.

Rep. John Taber of New York, senior Republican on the Appropriations Committee, predicted the bill would be vetoed.

A compromise of separate measures passed last year by the Senate and the House, the bill would raise to 900 million dollars the present ceiling of 500 million on federal grants for construction of local sewage disposal plants. The grants would be spread over a 10-year period.

The compromise total is 100 million more than the Senate approved last year and 100 million less than the House originally voted.

The government's share of the cost of any project would be limited to $450,000, or 30 per cent of the overall cost, whichever is lower.

The bill is an authorization only. It does not provide the actual money to finance the program.

President Eisenhower set a 20-million-dollar annual appropriation figure in his 1960 budget message. His view was that local governments should pay more of the program costs.
