Touch Subs For Sight

PETERBOROUGH, N.H. (UPI) — "A blind man doesn't develop extra senses after losing his sight; he just makes better use of the ones he still has."

That is why Bob Sterling, blinded by shrapnel during World War II, is relied upon for super critical inspection of miniature ball bearings made by New Hampshire Ball Bearings, Inc.

By using one of his remaining senses, touch, Sterling checks bearings so small that nine of them would fit, side by side, on one aspirin tablet.

It is a heavy responsibility because these tiny bearings are used in gyroscopes that keep ballistic missiles on course or in the control system of an electronic brain.

Sterling is competing with an elaborate and expensive electronic device designed to perform the same test he does. In some tests, Sterling is more reliable because his sensitive fingers are more accurate and the company depends upon him to locate flaws too fine for even the electronic equipment to detect.
