Justice Was Speedy In Old Greece

CHICAGO (UPI) — The ancient Greeks meted out speedy justices and kept the court calendars clear compared with the clogged dockets in most United States courts today.

How they accomplished this is told by Gertrude E. Smith, chairman of the University of Chicago's Department of Classical Languages and Literatures, in "The University of Chicago Reports."

For one thing, she said, murder was not considered a crime against the state in ancient Greece, and, unless a male relative of the dead person brought charges, the state had no grounds on which to act.

When a charge was brought, the King of Archon, chief of Athenian courts, would conduct three investigations, a month apart, and then either assign the case to a court or throw it out for lack of evidence.

If the case went to court, continued Mrs. Smith, "all persons connected with the trial — prosecutors, defendants and witnesses — swore a solemn oath over a sacrifice. Then the trial began. "Four speeches were given, two by each side; the second set formed concluding remarks. A secret vote (of the jury) was taken, with a simple majority needed for conviction. It was all over in a day."

Rome Aims To Remain Green

ROME (UPI) — The Italian government has drafted a detailed plan to keep a mounting tide of cement from engulfing the remaining public parks of Rome, which used to be one of the world's greenest cities.

The plan includes a gigantic park and a new road along the ancient Appian Way. The park will be as big as all the city's existing parks and gardens put together.

The bold plan was outlined by Public Works Minister Giuseppe Togni.

His project is the answer to widespread complaints that Rome's growth — its population has grown from 250,000 to 2,000,000 in 90 years — is destroying the Eternal City's unique parks and lovely suburban meadows to make way for houses.

The minister said a bill currently under preparation will reserve a certain area in every city district for public parks, playgrounds and sports fields.

An eight-mile network of foot paths also is contemplated.
