Dummies Used For Training

By JACK BRANNAN

United Press International

FORT SILL, Okla. (UPI)—The Army, bless it, is earnestly trying to save the taxpayers' money in training men to fire missiles.

In the past, trainees learned to fire their weapons by going to a range and blasting at a target. Not so anymore — not with a single Redstone missile carrying a price tag in the neighborhood of $300,000.

Using up these missiles for multi-firing training purposes would make a considerable dent in any pocketbook, even the government's, to say nothing of the danger involved in allowing trainees to fire the giant weapon across vast areas.

So the Army is using a device at its Artillery and Missile Center here which does everything that a real Redstone does, except blast off.

The "stand-in" missile, which costs an estimated $30,000, can be used repeatedly for training shots. It reacts to checkouts and firing operations exactly as a "live" missile would, even through flight, which the electrical devices can simulate.

Capt. John B. Riordan, chief of the Redstone Instructional Branch, pointed out that the potential danger of allowing trainees to fire a "live" missile, plus the damage caused by continued tinkering with the Redstone, is eliminated by the trainer.

"Allowing inexperienced trainees to handle a tactical missile would not only shorten the life span of the missile," he said, "it would also increase the chances for a malfunction in firing."

"Reliability is the problem with missiles. It takes only one malfunction among the missile's millions of parts to ruin a firing mission."

The "brains" of the training missile are in a truck, called the "analyzer van," loaded with electronic computers and reactors. These devices trigger responses in the trainer missile to checkout and firing procedures issued from the missile's fire control unit.
