"GOD AND THE

AND HAPPY NEW YEAR!

COLUMBUS, Ga. (UPI)—Police stopped an Army sergeant for running through a stop sign here Thursday, but they didn't have the heart to press charges against him.

The sergeant's name, they discovered, was Merry Christmas, and he was hurrying from Ft. Aberdeen, Md., to LaGrange, Ga., to be married.

Revolution Noted In Way Of Living For U.S. Elderly

OREGON STATE COLLEGE — Rapid and dramatic changes have taken place in "ways of living for the elderly" in recent decades and still more are ahead as the number of older persons increases in the U.S., a retired Oregon State College home economist points out in the November Journal of Home Economics.

Opinions concerning the duty of children for the care of aged parents—and the duty of the parents to conform to what is planned for them—are in the process of reversal, Maud M. Wilson points out in her article.

The reversal has widespread ramifications, she adds, for both old and young.

"In the old days, members of each generation felt it a duty to look after their old folks with the expectation that they in turn would be cared for by their descendants," Miss Wilson said.

"The problem of how the older person lived was relatively simple," she noted. "If he could, he stayed on in the family home with someone to keep it up and care for him. Or he might go to live with a married son or daughter, sharing in the life and work of the household, assured of care when he needed it, but with little freedom to pursue his own interests."

Today, family homes are smaller, fewer have extra rooms suitable for aging relatives, and there is less household work for older persons to do making them less apt to feel needed, Miss Wilson stated.

"This revolution is hard on the old folks who in their younger days took care of their aging parents in their own homes or who spent their surplus earnings maintaining separate homes for them with the expectation that they in turn would be cared for by their children," Miss Wilson wrote. "There are still countless three-generation families, but usually from choice, not necessity."

"Basic to the recommendation for a good life for the older person is that it should be possible for him to maintain his status as an independent and useful person as long as life lasts," she insists in the article.

Home needs and choices of retired persons must be considered, of course, in the light of finances, health, and by preferences for the use of leisure time. The majority of retirees will take it for granted that they will continue to live as they have done during their working years, the article said. To reduce the labor involved in operating a home, they may see possibilities in remodeling and adding mechanical equipment for greater comfort and convenience and in the use of more commercial services such as laundry, housecleaning, yard work, etc.

Specially-planned housing makes living easier, provides greater companionship for older people in many cases, and lets them remain independent. Retirement homes and retirement villages, apartments planned for older persons, and progressive nursing homes are new concepts that have come about, Miss Wilson said.

About 10 per cent of the "mobile home" owners in the U.S. are retirees and trailer manufacturers expect this group to grow in size, she noted. In some areas, trailer parks have been made a part of the overall community planning.

Old age, like other phases of life, is marked by change, not only in physical condition but in outlook, ambitions and desires, Miss Wilson pointed out. This certainty of change points up the desirability of "readily changed living arrangements," she stressed. There is need also for a period in which a contemplated living arrangement can be tried out before the shift is made permanent.

Miss Wilson suggests that the home economics profession can help with design and arrangement of housing for older persons by research on how specific features are evaluated by representative old people of various cultural and income groups. Miss Wilson was formerly in charge of home economics research at OSC before her retirement and is author of numerous publications on household planning and management.
