France Plans To Fire Pacific Island H-Bomb

PARIS (UPI)—France is starting preparations to explode her first H-bomb in the remote Gambia Islands in the Pacific Ocean about 1,000 miles southeast of Tahiti, possibly within two years, reliable French sources said today.

The government refused official confirmation.

The sources said the Armed Forces Ministry and the French Atomic Energy Commission have started active preparations for the test.

The Gambia Islands are an archipelago belonging to France. The actual explosion will take place on Mangareva Island in the Gambia group, the sources said. Mangareva has a population of about 500 persons.

This would be France's first hydrogen bomb test. The French have set off four above ground atomic explosions in their nuclear testing ground in the Sahara Desert since February, 1960. There have also been one or two underground tests there.

France has never tried to explode a hydrogen device in the Sahara. French officials said the danger would be too great.

Explosion of a hydrogen bomb is considered an important stage in President Charles de Gaulle's plans for giving France an independent nuclear striking force.

New Zealand's leading newspaper, the Auckland Star, called for a complete ban on all hydrogen bomb testing in the South Pacific.
