

Family Farms Still Nucleus Of Food Production

Despite Technological Explosion, Mechanization

FOOD & FARM: 4

By JOHN STROHM
Newspaper Enterprise Assn.
FRANKFORT, Ind. (NEA) — Fantastic things are happening on a serene-looking farm in the heart of Indiana's rich Corn Belt. Here Bill and Erland Rothenberger feed a 20-cent growth hormone to a yearling steer, and this miracle potion puts a $10 beef bonus into your freezer.

They spread 134,000 pounds of chemical fertilizer on 360 acres, and get a bin-busting corn crop double their 65 bushels-per-acre yields of 20 years ago. Complex pesticides let animals and plants bite back at bugs, so you can buy food and clothes a third cheaper.

These wonders swept in with a technological explosion that came so fast few folks away from the farm know it even happened. But evidence is graphic—production giants compared with the nostalgic family farm of 20 years ago. But they're still family managed and family run.

Corporation farms with herds of nameless hired men haven't come true. Only half of one per cent of America's farms are run by a manager. Some company farms that looked good on paper now are crumbling.

Plush Fashion Farms sprang up in Iowa seven years ago — a "cow pool" where farmers and city investors could bond cows for care and milking. Promotion billed it the world's most efficient milk factory.

Last August, bankruptcy locked the doors of Fashion Farms. It was impossible to give 800 cows individual care. Hired hands lacked the interest needed to coax extra milk from a brawny Holstein.

Family farmers aren't surprised. "A family spending its own money is going to plan and work harder than hired help will ever do for a corporation boss," says Bill Rothenberger.

Bill, 50, and his brother, Erland, 48, with after-school help from Erland's 17-year-old son, last year raised 1,396 market hogs, fed out 345 yearling steers and grew 360 acres of corn that produced over 130 bushels per acre.

To do this they had to be engineers enough to run $20,000 worth of machinery and blacksmiths enough to mend a broken axle a mile from home. They had to be economists enough to know when to spot weak points in their feeding system.

They were gamblers betting on the weather when they soaked an extra 100 pounds of nitrogen on corn. They were veterinarians when they spotted disease in their hog yards, snuffing it out before it could do damage.

They weren't chemists, but they knew what nitrogen, phosphorus, and potassium plowed into the topsoil would return in higher yields.

They weren't diplomats, but they convinced their wives that a $5,000 tractor would increase profits enough to pay for a new stove.

The Rothenbergers are good-sized capitalists and yet they're day laborers who often work 90 hours a week. They need brains to plan production from 400 acres so it makes economic sense — and brown enough to collar a hog and clamp a ring in his nose.

And to top it all, they must be able to walk into the Farmer's Bank of Frankfort and ask for a $25,000 loan without batting an eye.

"We've got $300,000 tied up in land, buildings, livestock and equipment," explains Erland. "Shell out $5,000 for a new five-plow tractor and you run up a $20,000 machinery investment fast."

Mechanization has given a farmer amazing muscles. When Bill and Erland started farming 20 years ago, they had the power of 12 to 15 horses. Now they command 300 horsepower.

Their automatic cattle feeding unit cost $5,000. "But we feed a full ration to 310 head of cattle in three minutes, three times a day," says Bill. "You've got to handle volume to make a go of it today."

These tools are important, but it takes guts to invest, and brains to run them. New fertilizer formulations and better ways to apply them are constantly emerging from experiment stations. Vitamin A is a must for efficient beef production, and you measure it in parts per million. A stream of new machinery is available to do a job easier, faster, cheaper. But a farmer living, but often work 12 or 14 hours a day to do it.

Farm wages have not kept pace with industry. Many of the efficient million and a half farmers earn less than $2 an hour for their labor on a $100,000 investment. The average factory worker earns $2.42 per hour, plus 27 cents fringe benefits—and his only investment is a $3 lunch bucket.

Capital requirements are at an all-time high. The top million and a half farms have an average investment of $100,000. A young farmer needs from $20,000 to $50,000 investment to start as a renter on a Midwest grain farm, with out any cash outlay for land.

All farmers are caught in a cost-price squeeze. Gross farm income has gone up $6 billion in the last 15 years, but farm production expenses have skyrocketed $10.6 billion, or nearly twice as fast.

The Rothenbergers and the other commercial farmers who produce 90 per cent of our food are battling their problems successfully, because they're the nation's best. They will continue to be superior — only if government controls do not hamstring them into mediocrity.

Their success is vitally important to you and your family.

Small Boat Safety Defended In Knife, Fork Speech Here

By MARGARET SAUNDERS
"Little boats, properly managed, are safe anywhere on the ocean," Patrick Ellum assured members of the Klamath Falls Knife and Fork Club at the dinner meeting on Monday, Feb. 11. His unusual tale of the unusual pioneering trip that proved to the adventurous Ellum that a boat of moderate means can sail the seas in a small, inexpensive boat captivated his audience here.

Ellum and his lone companion, Colin Mosley, spent a full year in planning, research and study before setting out to prove to themselves and the world just how safe small sailboats are. Extra provisions and repair parts were sent ahead to predetermined bases on the 10,000-mile route; gale and hurricane seasons were carefully considered; the small craft was checked and rechecked; finally all was in readiness for the long voyage ahead. The 19-foot sailboat "Soprano," smallest of the wind instruments, with her crew of two left Falmouth Harbor and began to make her way down the coast of Spain and Portugal to Africa and the trade winds which would carry her across the Atlantic.

After each leg of the journey, Ellum and Mosley spent several weeks in port getting ready for the leg ahead. Six weeks were spent in the Canary Islands in preparation for the long haul across the Atlantic. Provisions had to be carefully calculated due to the limited storage facilities aboard the small craft. Each man was limited to one quart of water per day for all purposes—drinking, cooking, bathing, shaving. When all was done that could be done to assure their safety and comfort during the long weeks ahead, the two men once again climbed aboard their small craft and set sail for Barbados in the West Indies.

In a small sailboat being propelled by winds of 30 to 40 miles per hour, cooking and eating became somewhat like housekeeping on a roller coaster. However, one lesson to coordinate his motions with that of the rolling ship and after a few days practice may even master the tricky art of consuming a bowl of cereal with cream without spilling a drop. Dishes are washed by holding them over the side of the boat, provided there are no sharks swimming around underneath; in that event, leave them for the other crew member. Laundry is simply tied on behind and pulled through the water for a hundred miles.

After four weeks of sailing, Ellum sighted the Barbados light-house. The long haul was over; days and days of nothing but the blue and gray of water and sky and now at long last the beautiful green of the island. Ironically, having reached the island the crew was in no particular hurry to go ashore. They spent a little time here, visited an uninhabited island, a few other islands in the area and then journeyed on to Jamaica to prepare for the trip on to America.

Ellum and Mosley spent three weeks cleaning, painting and working on their boat in Jamaica. They also spent quite a bit of time helping with the filming of the movie "Jamaica Run." Many months had elapsed since the pair had sailed from England, and Mosley had to return home. Two Cubans accompanied Ellum to Havana. From there he sailed alone to Miami. Six weeks later he started on the final lap of the trip.

On Jan. 6, 1955, 16 months after sailing out of Falmouth Harbor, Ellum sailed the Soprano into New York Harbor. He had firmly believed that a small boat, properly managed, was perfectly safe anywhere on the seas and he had proved it. His account of the danger-filled trip is one of the great adventure stories of our time.

United Nations Offers Cuban Farm Aid Despite 'Regrets' By America

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The United States expressed "regrets" today that a $1.5 million United Nations agricultural aid project for Cuba, stalled since 1961, now is going ahead.

The project will provide technicians in animal husbandry, grasslands management and plant pathology in Cuba. It is an activity of the United Nations special fund, to which the United States contributes 40 per cent of the cost.

The project was originally approved as one of a number of aid projects around the world by the United Nations governing council in May, 1961.

The United States objected to the Cuban project being part of the package at that time but never forced its point to a vote. The projects were approved in a unit with the U.S. objection noted.

The Cuba project has been dormant since. But U.S. officials said today they had been notified by Paul G. Hoffman, managing director of the fund, that he has decided to tentatively go ahead with it. The U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization has also approved it.

The State Department issued a formal statement today expressing "regrets" but officials indicated privately they did not think the United States would get the necessary support if it now tried to force the issue to a vote.

The special fund has a long tradition of deciding on specific projects on technical rather than political grounds. The State Department's argument is that what it called Cuba's "chaotic agricultural situation" and "gross governmental mismanagement" would make the project useless.

The department statement also said Cuba's "persistent policy of hostility toward its neighbors" and its "support of subversion throughout the hemisphere preclude establishment there of normal cooperative relations necessary to the implementation of a United Nations project."

Along with $1.5 million to be provided by the U.N. special fund Cuba is to put up about $2 million.

U.S. officials said they had been assured by Hoffman that no U.S. money, materials or technicians would be used on the Cuba project. It was not clear, however, how contributions the United States has made to the fund could be segregated from the rest.

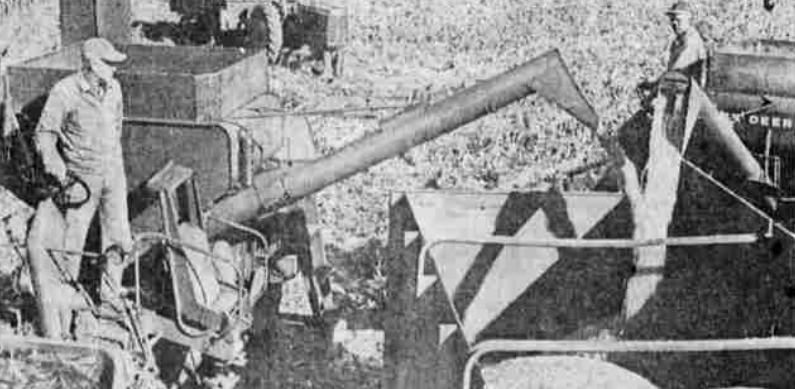

War I Veterans Hold Meeting
District in Veterans of World War I will hold their second meeting of the year at Bond Street, Feb. 17, at the VFW Hall, First and Bevoze streets. A dinner will be served at noon with a meeting to immediately follow.

All members of Barrecks 925 and the auxiliary are urged to attend and President of District 10, Edna Robertson of Klamath Falls, especially urges her Klamath Falls officers to be present.
