

Soundness Of Malaya Dollar Helps Group

By PHIL NEWSOM
UPI Foreign News Analyst

One of the chief reasons for the optimism that at the end of August a new Malaysian Federation will be born out of former British holdings in southeast Asia is a sheet of paper about four inches long, colored green and yellow.

It is the Malayan dollar, worth about 33 United States cents. It gives businessmen and politicians alike confidence that Malaysia will become a reality despite the vehement opposition of Indonesia and the somewhat lesser opposition of the Philippines.

The Malayan dollar represents the surest way to buy rice in southeast Asia. It is the region's hardest currency and already is in use throughout the Malaysia territories.

Singapore, for example, will gain little politically from membership in the federation and might even lose some revenues to the federal government.

Seek Protection
But Singapore's Chinese, making up 75 per cent of the 1.75 million population, look upon the federation both as protection from the instability of Indonesia and from the ambitions of Red China.

Businessmen of the Borneo territories of Brunei, Sarawak and North Borneo echo the same sentiments. The result has been that even with the short rebellion in Brunei to build upon, the anti-Malaysian forces have had little success.

The man whose brain-child the federation is, is Malayan Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman, noted for tough talk screened by soft words.

In Malaya, the British left behind a going economy based on tin and rubber.

Under Prince Rahmah, the Malaysians have expanded these facilities and sought means to diversify the economy. Roads have been built, jungle lands cleared, health and irrigation programs undertaken.

Foreign reserves are equal to nearly $50 million. In Tokyo last week, Prince Rahmah met with Indonesian President Sukarno in an effort to bring a halt to the insults which for months their two nations have been exchanging.

Note Dissimilarities
Newsmen were quick to note the dissimilarities between the two men of such similar back-grounds. Both speak a Malayan tongue and both are Moslems. But Sukarno is attempting to lead his nation along a confused path of "guided Democracy" which includes nationalism of industry. He proclaims neutrality but frequently seems to lean heavily toward the Communists.

He charges that the new federation is an attempt by former colonial powers to surround Indonesia.

Prince Rahmah believes frankly in capitalism and that Malaysia's future lies with close cooperation with the West. Coexistence with Communism, he believes, would be to invite a Red Chinese take-over.

His hopes for federation rest primarily on Malay's stability and relative prosperity. Despite the soft words of the final communiqué, Indonesia remains his greatest threat. It is unlikely that Sukarno's appetite for territory has been satisfied by his success against the Dutch in New Guinea.
