

Medicine Hole Still Keeps Mystery

KILLDEER, N.D. (UPI)—The mystery of the Medicine Hole in the Killdeer Mountains in western North Dakota still keeps its secret almost 100 years after Gen. Alfred Sully led his 2,220-man force into Dakota Territory to discipline 6,000 Sioux warriors.

His was a punitive expedition, to teach the warring Sioux, with all their squaws, children and dogs, a lesson. Sully's soldiers engaged the Sioux camp at the foot of the Killdeer on July 28, 1864. The entire camp fled in panic up the ravines into the Killdeer when Sully's forces attacked.

As night fell, Sully had a large band of Sioux surrounded atop one of the hills. The next morning the soldiers moved in to finish them off but they were gone! Where?

About a week later, Sully's army was miles west in the Badlands when it met Indians once again... the same Indians!

The facts confirm the first engagement between Sully's troops and Sioux warriors. From there on legend takes over—a legend that has been embellished over the years because frontier soldiers of the latter half of the 19th century were known to be better fighters than historians.

Legend says the trapped Indians escaped down the Medicine Hole—named for the smoky fog emitted on cold mornings. They are supposed to have traveled through a network of underground caverns underlying western North Dakota.

The Medicine Hole actually is a small entrance to a narrow, little-explored cave that extends down into one of the high, steep hills in the Killdeer Mountains.

Several attempts have been made to explore the cave but none very successfully.

What might the Medicine Hole yield if thoroughly explored? Nobody knows but the Medicine Hole—and it's not telling.
