Angry Driver Menace To Innocent People

By ANN LANDERS

Dear Ann Landers: My husband and I have been married for 12 years and we have four nice children. We don't get along any better or any worse than most married people although I've made a real effort to avoid arguments and maintain a peaceful atmosphere in our home.

When my husband loses his temper, which is fairly often, he claps on his hat, slams the door behind him and goes off for a drive. He calls this "getting rid of his anger behind the wheel."

I'm on needles and pins until he gets home. It worries me sick. He says it's a lot better than keeping the anger bottled up, and certainly better than socking somebody—meaning me, I suppose.

Will you please say a word in your column about people who do this? My husband reads you faithfully. — CONCERNED CONNIE

Dear Connie: Hospitals and graveyards are full of people who took their anger out behind the wheel. The real tragedy is that they usually manage to drag innocent people along with them.

Studies made by the National Safety Council prove that hostile, anxiety-ridden, angry drivers are a menace to everyone on the road—including themselves.

Suggest that your husband hang a punching bag in the garage so he can take his anger out there—safely.

Dear Ann Landers: If male viewers of scantily clad women are "sick, sick, sick" according to Ann Landers, then what do you have to say about women who wear sun suits when there's no sun, bikinis when they can't swim, shorter than short shorts for their grocery marketing, and capri pants that look as if they were put on with a spray gun?

Invariably the hussies who strut around in these provocative getups are the first ones to criticize a man for ogling.

Is there a word in your limited vocabulary to describe these characters? Or will my letter wind up on the floor?—THE INQUIRING SQUIRE

Dear Squire: Yes, I do have a word to describe these characters (in fact, I have two words): (1) Exhibitionist. (2) Teasers. And this is sick, sick, sick.

Dear Ann Landers: We have a
