Fashion Secrets of Glamorous Women

A famous—and outspoken—designer tells how you can learn to be well-dressed from the world's great beauties

By OLEG CASSINI

DOE-SLIM AUDREY HEPBURN may seem to have nothing in common with the average American woman, who is a good deal more amply proportioned. But that is not the case. Any woman who wants to be well-dressed would do well to follow Miss Hepburn's example in some respects.

The lovely Hollywood star knows herself. She realizes that her world is not the world of the flesh, so she goes to the opposite extreme and does everything she can to emphasize her ethereal fragility. That means straight-cut, sleeveless dresses; boat necks—and never a rounded, sensuous line. She even underplays her small bust. The result, by understatement, is physically attractive.

Of course, all women should not do this—only the Audrey Hepburns of this world. But every woman could and should do what Miss Hepburn has done: (1) take inventory of herself, (2) find out who she is, both physically and as a personality, and then (3) stick to the theme that is really hers—come what may.

This is the great secret of being well-
