According to frequency of mention, 13 factors in plant site consideration were dominant The first five, according to the frequency with which they were mentioned, were:

Proximity to good highways (71.9 per cent); abundant labor supply (62.1); availability of suitable land (61.6); proximity to markets (58.8); availability of rail service (41.1).

The study reported, however, that among larger firms, "the transportation factors of high-way and rail came more closeinto balance - the highway factor falling from first to third place when responses were weighted for size, and the rail factor moving from fifth to fourth."

Plant location decisions in some groups were particularly oriented toward the transportation factor, with both the highway and rail factors vital, the
