

The young sleuths asked the stranger if his name was O. Henry. He told them it was the name he wrote under. They learned later that his real name was William Sydney Porter and he had started writing in the Ohio penitentiary, where he served time for embezzlement.

Orr and Williams reached an agreement with him. He would write a story every week, but he would not come downtown to see the editor.

All arrangements were made through Tom Orr. Every Thursday he went to O. Henry's 53-a-week furnished room in E. 24th St. Sometimes the story would not even be started, so Orr would sit on the bed, while the writer worked at a rough wooden table.
