Many Higher Education Projects Must Await Bond Vote In May

Editors note: The full impact of the scrapping of construction projects as a result of the Oct. 15 tax referendum will not be known until voters next May decide the future of the $30 million higher education bond issue. Second of five.

Retirement Set By EOC Head

PORTLAND (UPI) — Dr. Frank B. Bennett, president of Eastern Oregon College at La Grande, will retire next Aug. 31 it was announced today.

By ZAN STARK
SALEM (UPI) — Students at state colleges and universities may have to slog through the mud, fight for space in overcrowded classrooms or attend classes in summer.

Needed repairs at state institutions have been postponed, and the new Agriculture Department building remains but a dream.

But the junking of $15.4 million in capital construction projects in the wake of the Oct. 15 tax referendum won't deny qualified students an educational opportunity, and state wards will not be denied care—at least in the immediate future.

Full impact of higher education construction cutbacks won't be known until next May, when voters decide the fate of a $30 million higher education bond issue.

Approval of the bonds would allow most of the projects approved for this biennium to proceed — although the $12 million in projects the bonds originally were to finance would remain in limbo.

During the special session of the legislature the proposed bond issue was revised so that if it passes the $13 million in community college construction that was junked after the Oct. 15 vote can proceed.

The scrapping of building projects created many hardships. In 1961 the legislature authorized about $2 million for a science building at Portland State College. This project was a victim of the austerity program because construction had not yet started.

Yet this week the Board of Higher Education was able to authorize a $1 million multi-level student parking facility — because funds for this project were not affected by the Oct. 15 election.

In 1961, $6 million was approved for construction of a new Oregon Technical Institute campus at Klamath Falls. The 1963 legislature earmarked more than $300,000 for sidewalks, driveways, parking areas and landscaping at OTI. This fell victim to the economy axe.

When the new campus opens late next year students may be wading through mud to get to new classrooms.

The Agriculture Department, long anxious to move out of its present outdated building, also fell victim to the economy drive. The department has the $1 million-plus needed for the new structure — but cutbacks froze the few thousand dollars needed to buy the last parcels of land on which the new building was to be erected.

Some $2.4 million in Board of Control projects—remodeling at Columbia Park Hospital, heating plants at Fairview Home and Eastern Oregon Hospital, an administration building at Hillcrest, land acquisition—were victims of the cutbacks.

The following higher education projects had been budgeted from the 1963-65 general fund, but were cancelled. They may be financed by the bond issue if it passes next May:

Replacement of Campbell Hall, $292,000, and class and laboratory building, $820,000, at Oregon College of Education; utility tunnel, $465,000 and mathematics building, $750,000, at Oregon State University; physical education building at Portland State, $3.4 million; Southern Oregon College class and laboratory building, $965,000; and science and mathematics building at Eastern Oregon College, $675,000. In addition, the plan is to include the Portland State science building, and money for sidewalks at OTI, in the bond-financed projects.

The construction delays compound the difficulties created by the $20 million in one-shot revenues picked up for this biennium.

It is relatively easy to cut spending as the result of the Oct. 15 tax referendum. But the increased demands on state schools and institutions that result from spiraling populations, bookkeeping changes, included as revenue for 1963-65 money that normally would have been collected in the 1965-67 biennium.

Delaying construction in 1963-65 simply means that the building bill in 1965-67 will be bigger, and more urgent.
