Air Force Chief Wore 4 Stars For 22 Years

WASHINGTON (UPI)—Gen. Curtis E. LeMay, the man who organized the Berlin airlift and commanded the B-29s which dropped atomic bombs on Japan, retired to civilian life as quietly as possible.

Unlike Adm. George W. Anderson who was retired as chief of naval operations in 1963, LeMay—wearer of four stars for 22 years—had no parting blast at the civilian high command which he had served since June 30, 1961.

LeMay's successor as Air Force chief of staff is Gen. John P. McConnell, a native of Booneville, Ark. President Johnson nominated 57-year-old McConnell, a pilot and staff officer in the Asiatic Theater in World War II, to a two-year term.

Anderson, who failed to win reappointment as chief of naval operations after he opposed the administration's decision on the TFX fighter plane, made a speech denouncing alleged disregard of military opinion on military matters.

But LeMay, who also opposed the TFX and won only a one-year reappointment which was later extended, is a man of few words. A parting blast wasn't his style. If there are any fireworks, they could be shot off by his admirers.

The 58-year-old Air Force leader said many times that he favored full development of a new supersonic bomber such as the B70 and also the development of a new fighter interceptor. Neither recommendation was accepted.

Appropriate Circumstances
Despite his known disagreements with the administration, the general has never urged his views except under the appropriate circumstances.

His only forum on controversial questions, consequently, has been congressional committees where military leaders are under orders to express their personal opinions, regardless of the administration policy.

It was before such committees that LeMay, who also opposed the TFX and won only a one-year reappointment which was later extended, is a man of few words. A parting blast wasn't his style. If there are any fireworks, they could be shot off by his admirers.

Head Atlantic Force
Later, as the war drew to a close, he was chief of staff and in active command of the 12th force which dropped on Japan the only two atomic bombs ever exploded in anger.

In 1946, commanding the U.S. Air Force in Europe, he organized the Berlin airlift. With that operation still continuing, he returned home to organize the Strategic Air Command (SAC) which he headed for nine years before becoming Air Force vice chief of staff.

Though his associates are confident he will have no difficulty in getting a civilian job, LeMay said recently that he doesn't have one and hasn't decided what he will do.

The size of the pay is also an important consideration in any job he takes. He likes to live well, as is testified by the fat cigars he perpetually smokes, and to pursue hobbies which range from hi-fi music to big game hunting.
