CITY AND REGIONAL PLANNING

Owing to the fact that this community has at last taken some steps toward city planning, the following editorial from the Christian Science Monitor is reprinted for the information and interest it may contain for the readers of The News:

While the International City and Regional Planning conference is holding its great meeting in New York this week, jointly with some dozen other related societies and organizations, it will be interesting to observe the extent to which city planning has progressed in the United States and to speculate upon its future. The early American cities notoriously were not planned, but just grew up. The newer western cities, though systematically laid out, were not zoned in the manner that is now coming to be required. The national capital, in the arbitrarily created District of Columbia, was an outstanding exception in which a comprehensive plan was designed by an expert, with the result that it is one of the most beautiful and convenient cities in the world, with its fullest glory yet to be realized.

In recent decades the intensive development of industry and the resulting growth of great industrial cities have rendered the problem of city planning, or re-planning, an acute one. With the increased volume of business handled and density of population within limited areas, with the concurrent multiplication of motor vehicles and the consequent acceleration of vehicular traffic, the saturation point in the capacity of numerous city thoroughfares has been reached and exceeded. The mounting costliness of structural readjustments has pointed to the urgency of prompt action to meet present needs and provide for future growth. Hence the increasing prominence in recent years of the work of the city planning engineer and housing expert.

According to George B. Ford, president of the American conference, who delivered an address of welcome to the delegates, city planning was under way in 350 cities in twenty-two states in the United States in 1924, an increase of more than 100 over 1923. Such an increase, amounting to more than 40 per cent in a single year, may be said to denote a phenomenal spread of interest in this field of municipal activity, which is further attested by the fact that the present conference, the first international meeting of the kind to be held in America, is participated in by so large a number of professional and civic organizations.

Yet city planning may be said to be in its infancy. Incredible apathy to the need for comprehensive readjustments persists in many overcrowded, congested cities. Even smaller towns, possessing thriving industries, are losers by neglecting to plan thus for future growth. That by 350 cities in twenty-two out of the forty-eight states of America are actively engaged in such planning only illustrates how great an awakening to the needs of the age yet remains to be experienced. The industrial era, its larger development lying still in the future, has brought the necessity to plan whole cities and regions, to render industry most efficient and to preserve wholesome residential conditions along with it. That this need is being recognized is apparent in the scope and prominence of the conference now in session. Its stimulus to further interest in city planning should prove a great public benefit.

A democracy is a land where a man learns to wear a dinner coat before he learns not to wear a toothpick.

Being neutral doesn't make you any friends, but it saves wear and tear on your ears.

And yet if beards were not tough some men wouldn't have anything to be proud of.

The world court won't be needed if we can have a little more world courting.

FOR the KIDDIES

The Adventures of Raggedy Ann and Raggedy Andy

It was very fortunate that Raggedy Ann, Raggedy Grampy Hoppytoad and little Ned found the nice pretzels and the sparkling spring of gingerale after riding their scooters over the invisible wall the magician had hidden them in their search for little Ned's nice mama.

But after eating so many pretzels and drinking sparkling gingerale our friends knew they would not be for ten or fifteen minutes at least, so they hopped on magic scooters and went riding down the path, following footprints of little Ned's nice mama. Grampy Hoppy could see her footprints very easily for he had a fine magical spectacles.

And so they rode along for quite a ways, laughing, talking and wondering how much farther they would go before they came to where the magician lived. They were pretty certain that the magician had taken little nice mama, for back in the woods, three funny little men tried to stop them, and had told them that they did it because the magician had ordered them to stop the Raggedys.

"The magician does not wish us to rescue little Ned's mama!" Raggedy Ann said as she rode along. "We watch carefully that he does not fool us in some way and sure us. For, should he do that, then there would be no to rescue us, we would be prisoners as well as Ned's mama."

So, as they rode along, they watched for more walls and also for wires which might be stretched across path to upset their magic scooters, but they rode so easily, they soon felt that perhaps they would not have more accidents.

Finally, they came to a queer little cottage which was much larger than a big drygoods box. There was a crooked window at the front and a very wobbly chimney at the back. "You don't 'spect the magician lives here do you?" Grampy Hoppytoad asked as our friends all stopped their scooters.

"Oh, no, Grampy Hoppytoad," Raggedy Ann said. "The magician could make a much better house with his This is probably some witch's house!"

Raggedy Ann knocked at the door and a long arm put her head out. "Run as fast as you can!" she said. "The magician catches you here, he will make you prisoners you will never escape." "We shan't run from any magician!" Raggedy Ann said.

"Ah!" the little old witch said. "You are very brave, you do not know how much magic the magician can do for you. Just look at me! Once I was a pretty young lady one day when I came walking through the woods, a man came up to me. 'Do you know how to bake pancakes with maple syrup on them?' he asked.

"Silly!" I replied, 'I know how to bake pancakes, and you have to do is to pour the maple syrup on the pancakes. Then he caught hold of my arm in a very rude manner started to pull me towards a large castle I saw in the distance. But I did not like that, so I boxed his ear so hard he started suddenly upon the ground "blump" like that, and I started run. I did not run far, though, for I bumped into an invisible wall and fell down. He waved his magic wand at me and said: "Now I shall punish you for boxing my ear. As a punishment of being a pretty young lady, you will become a nosed old witch. And have to live in this tumble down cottage surrounded by the magic invisible wall! You will not get away very easily, I can tell you! The poor old witch continued to live here for many years and I always find the invisible wall when I try to get away."

"You had better run, the magician discovers you here and punishes you as he will!" The poor old witch crying and Raggedy Ann gave her three pretzels and she would stop. Then she said: "Run, run, run, down to think of some way to rescue the poor witch, and help her change back into a young lady."
