KLAMATH RIVER PROJECT OPENS

12 1/2 feet in diameter and nearly 400 feet in length to the power house below. In the power house, which is of structural steel construction, there will be found two vertical type generating units, each consisting of a 20,000 horsepower turbine and 15,000 kilowatt generator. After passing through the turbines the water is returned to the Klamath river by means of a tailrace 75 feet wide and 250 feet long.

With the completion of this new power plant the Copco generating system will embrace a total of 11 different power plants on three principal rivers, namely: the Klamath, the Rogue and the Umpqua, with a total capacity of over 100,000 turbine horsepower.

This entire project is of extreme interest throughout and will no doubt prove a revelation to those who have never visited an extensive hydro-electric development of such magnitude. Members of the Copco organization will act as guides, and will personally conduct the visitors over the job. The roads leading into Copco are said to be in good condition and no difficulty is anticipated in caring for the unusually heavy travel which is expected in connection with the big event on July 5.

I did not accomplish the purpose for which I was brought to Philadelphia, it was not my fault. "I have not been fighting crime and vice so much as I have been fighting political influence that opposed me at every turn."
