

THE BEST OF ADVICE

We often hear it said—"People never learn anything."
The phrase has no basis or suggestion of truth.
We are always learning.
Our education never ends.
Every waking hour of our lives, we are, either consciously or subconsciously, acquiring some new experience and absorbing it.
We can do nothing which does not give up some new acquaintance with nature.
We are instructed by all of the petty experiences which usurp the hours and years.
Some wisdom comes out of every natural and innocent action.

Nevertheless, most of us profit but little spiritually or materially, from this education that is ever washing upon us like the ceaseless tides of the ocean. We draw but infinitesimally little upon this great store of natural wisdom for power.

Let him who would profit from it have above all accurate perceptions. Let him, as Emerson says, "if he have hands, handle; if eyes, measure and discriminate; let him accept and live every fact of natural history, economics, chemistry; the more he has the less he is willing to spare any one."

Time is always bringing the occasions that disclose their value. The application of means to ends brings rewards in every phase of life.

Did it ever occur to you that we never like to seek things for themselves, but for the search?

The scientist, the great secret found, promptly shifts it aside and begins to seek the solution of a new problem.

The explorer, the mountain scaled or the river's source found, rests not, but starts on another perilous trip.

The general, one world at his feet, sighs for other worlds to conquer.

Our native consists in motion; complete rest is death.

"If a soldier, or laborer, complains of the hardship of his lot, set him to do nothing," remarked Pascal, to

Originality Aim of Odd Trimming

To be strictly up-to-date you must have as original a design as possible embroidered on your frock. This "costume orientale," as it is called, is made of white cashmere over a gray crepe underslip, the latter forming the vestee and skirt hem. Odd oriental figures are embroidered on the skirt panels.

When it seemed that nothing is so insufferable to man as to be at rest without passions, without business, without diversions, without study.
"He then feels his nothingness, his forlornness, his dependence, his weakness, his emptiness."
"There will immediately arise in the depth of his heart weariness, gloom, sadness, fretfulness, vexation, despair."

Nothing is more common than the weariness we feel in leaving pursuits to which we are attached.

Pascal, considering the different distractions of men, the pains and perils to which they expose themselves, decided that all the happiness of men arises from the single fact that they cannot stay quietly in their own home.

Another ponderous volume comes forth in advocacy of the theory that man's destiny is ruled wholly by natural laws.

If men grow into what they are by natural laws, they cannot help being what they are; and if they cannot help being what they are, a good deal will have to be altered in our general view of human obligations and responsibilities.

There is no doubt that natural laws do direct many of man's actions but natural laws are not everything.

A child born in a Mohammedan country usually grows a Mohammedan; in a Christian; and so on.

His opinions are like his language, he learns to think as he learns to speak. His views are largely those of his environment.

These are not matters of natural law, but of circumstance.

We take pains to educate children. There is, we know, a good education and a bad education.

We try to train him in good habits.

We keep him out of the way of temptation as much as we can; We see that he is well taught in school;

We surround him with every good influence we can command.

These are what are termed the advantages of good education; and if we fail to provide these under our care with it, and if they go wrong, the responsibility we feel is as much ours as theirs.

Thus we recognize that it is no mere matter for a boy's free will whether he turns out well or ill.

This is an admission of the power over us of outward circumstances.

In general it is perfectly obvious that men do necessarily absorb, out of the influences in which they grow up, something which gives them a complexion to their whole after-character.

To Beat July Record

At Golden Rule

Record is average of 354 Customers a Day for First 23 Days of Business in July.

This record of an average of 354 buying customers a day for the first 23 business days in this month, counting the 3rd and 4th, with half holidays, as one day, represents a satisfactory increase over July of 1924 for volume of business and a gratifying growth in the popularity of the Golden Rule as a buying center for economy, style, quality and appearance. June of this year showed a 13-plus per cent increase in volume of business over June of 1924, also.
