acres. All but 300 acres of dry land was sold.

They were to pay $35 an acre—one-fifth down and the rest on long terms at eight per cent. In addition there was a $30 water charge and a $12 drainage charge.

Went to Work

The Bohemian farmers went to work. Some built barns before they erected houses. All the time they fought the soil for the best that was in it. They are still getting the best out of the land. They have built homes, have a bank, a motion picture theatre, three mercantile establishments, restaurant, a flour mill—in short an exceedingly prosperous community centered at Malin. It is a community of which the great Klamath country can well be proud. It is a great deal more.

It is the history of colonization projects, when they are successful, that from three to five farmers, one after the other, come and go. Each successive tiller of the soil profits by the improvements of those who have gone before. But on the Lakeside project only one farmer quit. There has not been a foreclosure or any litigation between the company and the colonists. They have paid up in full. It is a record of achievement that will challenge any colonization scheme in the entire west.

Collier Secretary

In 1915 Andy Collier became secretary of the company. Alex Martin, Jr., and Rufus B. Moore came into an interest. These, together with Adams, and others into whose hands the original shares have fallen, participated in the last dividend sent out by Collier. This last dividend was founded on the sale of the last 300 acres recently.

But Collier, Martin and Moore give all credit for the success of the project to Adams. He, in turn, pays tribute to the industrious character of the Malin settlers.

Stories are told of how Adams loaned his settler friends cows, horses and mules until they could get money to pay for them. How he went among them with an interpreter to find out what they needed and then saw that they got it.

And then, as a finale, when Collier was winding up the affairs of the company, he called on the shareholders to deliver their certificates. Adams had lost his.
