HYSTERIA

No single event in recent years has so impressed certain people as the passing of Valentino. No outreach of human emotion has been so marked. The man himself was only a type, a practical stranger except through the movies, and in no sense immune from life's tragedies. We may idolize and worship all we please, but the inexorable law remains—"one by one we must each file on."

To show the extent of this hysteria we read of 5000 roses covering his casket, making a blanket six feet wide by eleven feet long. And in the same paper is this telegram from San Francisco:

"Beaten in a bitter, long-drawn-out fight against poverty, Mrs. Adna Fuller, 39, tucked her five little children, four boys and a girl, in the two beds in her basement apartment today and then turned on the gas in the two rooms of the place, taking four of the children to eternity with her. The fifth was saved by the father, who arrived home in time to find his home a gas-filled sepulchre."

Some contrast, indeed, and yet these unfortunates are sleeping too, with no one much to care, and no mob to storm their citadel of rest. It makes one stop and wonder whether we are drifting, when American sentiment can so completely swamp itself.

The sooner we get back to first principles and measure values by old-time standards the better it will be for our future as a commonwealth. All the hysteria in Christendom will not alter one iota the endless procession. Our coming and going is of very little importance, but the picture of four sleeping children beside their mother is of really large consequence.

AFTER AWHILE

It is pleasing to observe that certain state officials are still on the job of bossing things. When one line of endeavor exhausts itself they are ready with something new, and the average individual may be fortunate to be allowed to sneeze without permission. In another column we show the middle of things they have made in Medford with pears. Now comes state orders on poultry, requiring official certificates on eggs, baby chicks and breeding stock, which will put the Kibosh on many shipments from California. Without knowing much about it, the requirement may be advisable, but for the love of Mike, why so much red tape and paternalism regarding everything anyone wants to do?

After awhile we can all expect to be card-indexed and graded to meet the official fancy of some city or state Pooh-ba. Parents with too many children will be zoned so as not to disturb peaceful bachelors or sedate spinsters. Then would come proper disposition of families to avert jealousies. People who keep dogs and those who keep cats would be relegated to different sections, and politicians could be segregated on the mud-sliding flats. Another zone might be set aside for motorists who attempt more than fifteen miles an hour, although every state urges them to speed up. Any bright mind can easily figure out a hundred new regulations and restrictions that will enable officials to connect regularly with stated salaries, regardless of who pays the piper.

One thing is certain—unless Oregon cuts out much of this nonsense and allows some measure of individual liberty, it will have difficulty holding the present ratio of eight people to the acre. Of what use is cheap land and available water if living and working conditions are made arbitrary? The pendulum of authority has already swung to extremes. What is needed is good common-sense and the assurance of hands off as regards any more "experiments."

BONEHEAD TACTICS

(Salem Journal)

Pear growers of the Rogue river valley which had a record crop this year, have been treated to as fine an exhibition of paternalistic bureaucracy as is possible to imagine. As a result of uncalculated pernicious and malicious interference by federal agents who know little or nothing above red-tape, many orchardists face ruin and bankruptcy through loss of fruit and demoralized markets.

Because the growers sprayed their pears against codlin moth with spray containing arsenate of lead, a formula prescribed by the government itself, and the only preventive of the moth, on the pretense that the fruit was thereby poisoned and unfit to eat, carload shipments of fancy pears, the finest grown anywhere, were seized, condemned and destroyed, shipments were held up, buyers scared from the market, and the entire industry demoralized. After the damage had been done experts decided the pears were harmless and permitted shipments to continue—but lost fruit cannot be recovered, or the damage to reputation restored.

The spray used was the same as used on Rogue river fruit for the past 20 years, and no one ever heard of illness resulting from the small amount of spray spread three months before upon a pear. The same spray is used on pears everywhere, in all the California, Oregon and Washington districts—yet only the Rogue river valley product was singled out for punishment by some ignoramus swelled up by the importance of his job.

In one case a carload of pears was condemned and destroyed, in spite of the fact that they had never been sprayed at all. But the bureaucrats are all powerful in managing our business nowadays and protest only makes them worse.
