The Mystery Of Love

The early sunlight filtered through the filmy draperies to where a wondering baby stretched his dimpled hands to catch the rays that lit his face and flesh like dawn lights up a rose. His startled gaze caught and held the dawn of day in rapturous looks that spoke the dawn of self, for which the morning gleam out came the greater wonder. It was a mystery of life. Across a cradle where, sunk in satin pillows, lay a still, pale form as drops a rose from some fierce heat, the evening shadows fell silent, and spoke of peace. The twilight calm enclosed the world in silence deep as truth, and on the little face the wondering look had given place to one of sweet repose. It was the mystery of death. At head and foot the tapers burned, a golden light that clove the night as hope the encircling gloom. Across the cot where lay the fair, frail form, his hand reached out to hers and met and clasped in tender burning touch. Into the eyes of each there came the light that is the light of life, that spoke of self to each, yet told they two were one. It was the mystery to which the mysteries of life and death bow down—the mystery of love.—James Hunt Cook.
